Volume Five

An Anthology from the

KHUDDAKA NIKĀYA

Translations of some of the books found in the fifth collection, the Khuddaka Nikāya — Short Collection — such as the Dhammapada, Udāna, and Itivuttaka have been published previously as stand-alone collections. They are included in this all-in-one resource along with the first book of the Khuddaka Nikāya, the Khuddakapāṭha. Other significant books planned for inclusion are the Sutta Nipāta, Theragāthā, and Therīgāthā.

Introduction to the Khuddakapāṭha

This, the first book in the Khuddaka Nikāya (Collection of Short Discourses), appears to have been designed as a primer for novice monks and nuns. In nine short passages it covers the basic topics that one would need to know when beginning Buddhist monastic life; many of the passages also serve as useful introductions to Buddhist practice in general.

Passages 1 and 2 cover the ceremony for taking ordination as a novice. Passage 3 gives preliminary guidance in the contemplation of the body, a meditation exercise designed to overcome pride in one's own bodily appearance, and lust for the bodies of others. Passage 4 introduces many of the basic categories of analysis through which discernment can be developed, beginning with the most basic formulation of the causal principle so central to the Buddha's teaching. By stating that all beings subsist on food, this formulation provides a graphic image for the causal principle, while at the same time indicating that causality is not an innocent or painless process.

Passage 5 gives an overview of the practice as a whole—beginning with the need to associate with wise people, and ending with the attainment of unbinding (nibbāna/nirvāṇa). This overview is presented in the context of the concept of protective rituals, and makes the point that—given the nature of human action and its results—the best protection comes not from rituals but from acting in a generous, moral, and wise manner. Passage 6 expands both on Passage 1 and on Passage 5, detailing some of the virtues of the Buddha, Dhamma, and Saṅgha, while at the same time elaborating on the practice of meditation and the attainment of stream entry—the point at which the meditator has his/her first glimpse of unbinding. Passage 7 elaborates on the theme of generosity, showing how gifts to the Saṅgha can be dedicated to the welfare of one's dead relatives. Passage 8 presents meritorious action in general as an investment more reliable and longer lasting than material investments. Passage 9 returns to the subject of meditation, focusing on the development of goodwill as a topic of concentration, in the context of the complete training in virtue, concentration, and discernment.

These nine passages, in different contexts, are frequently chanted in Theravāda countries even today. Lay and ordained Buddhists chant Passage 1 daily, as an affirmation of their refuge in the Triple Gem. Monks will often chant Passages 5–9 as blessings when lay people make merit, and frequently use verses from Passage 5 as sermon themes.

Thus the passages contained in this short book serve as a useful introduction both to early Buddhist training and to modern Theravāda practices.

Homage to the Blessed One, the Worthy One, the Rightly Self-Awakened One.

Khp 1. Saraṇagamana — Going for Refuge

I go to the Buddha for refuge.
I go to the Dhamma for refuge.
I go to the Saṅgha for refuge.
A second time I go to the Buddha for refuge.
A second time I go to the Dhamma for refuge.
A second time I go to the Saṅgha for refuge.
A third time I go to the Buddha for refuge.
A third time I go to the Dhamma for refuge.
A third time I go to the Saṅgha for refuge.

Khp 2. Dasa Sikkhāpada — The Ten Training Rules

I undertake the training rule to refrain from taking life.

I undertake the training rule to refrain from stealing.

I undertake the training rule to refrain from sexual intercourse.

I undertake the training rule to refrain from telling lies.

I undertake the training rule to refrain from intoxicating fermented & distilled beverages that lead to carelessness.

I undertake the training rule to refrain from eating at the wrong time [after noon & before dawn].

I undertake the training rule to refrain from dancing, singing, music, & watching shows.

I undertake the training rule to refrain from wearing garlands and beautifying myself with perfumes & cosmetics.

I undertake the training rule to refrain from high & luxurious seats & beds.

I undertake the training rule to refrain from accepting gold & money.

Khp 3. Dvattiṁsākāra — The 32 Parts

In this body there is:

hair of the head, hair of the body,
nails, teeth, skin,
muscle, tendons,
bones, bone marrow,
spleen, heart, liver,
membranes, kidneys, lungs, large intestines, small intestines, gorge, feces,
gall, phlegm, lymph, blood, sweat, fat, tears, oil, saliva, mucus, oil in the joints, urine, brain in the skull.[1]

Note

1. This item is not usually included in the list of the parts of the body in other parts of the Canon, such as DN 22, MN 10, and MN 119. Its presence here suggests that this passage—and perhaps the whole of Khp—was assembled during the time of the Commentaries, which unlike DN and MN, include the brain in the list.

Khp 4. Sāmaṇera Pañhā — The Novice's Questions

What is one?

> All beings subsist on nutriment. [There are these four nutriments for the establishing of beings who have taken birth or for the support of those in search of a place to be born. Which four? Physical nutriment, gross or refined; contact as the second, intellectual intention the third, and consciousness the fourth.]

What is two?

> Name-&-form. ["Feeling, perception, intention, contact, & attention: This is called name. The four great elements, and the form dependent on the four great elements: This is called form. This name & this form are called name-&-form." {SN 12:2}]

What is three?

> The three types of feeling [pleasant, painful, neither pleasant nor painful].

What is four?

> The four noble truths [stress, the origination of stress, the cessation of stress, the path of practice leading to the cessation of stress].

What is five?

> The five aggregates [form, feeling, perception, fabrications, consciousness].

What is six?

> The six internal sense media [eye, ear, nose, tongue, body, intellect].

What is seven?

> The seven factors for awakening [mindfulness, analysis of qualities, persistence, rapture, calm, concentration, equanimity].

What is eight?

What is nine?

> The nine abodes for beings ["Seven stations of consciousness and two dimensions:
>
> "There are beings with multiplicity of body and multiplicity of perception, such as human beings, some devas, and some beings in the lower realms. This is the first station of consciousness.
>
> "There are beings with multiplicity of body and singularity of perception, such as the devas of the Brahma hosts generated by the first (jhāna). This is the second station of consciousness.
>
> "There are beings with singularity of body and multiplicity of perception, such as the Radiant Devas. This is the third station of consciousness.
> "There are beings with singularity of body and singularity of perception, such as the Beautiful Black Devas. This is the fourth station of consciousness.
> "There are beings who, with the complete transcending of perceptions of [physical] form, with the disappearance of perceptions of resistance, and not heeding perceptions of multiplicity, [perceiving,] 'Infinite space,' arrive at the dimension of the infinitude of space. This is the fifth station of consciousness.

"There are beings who, with the complete transcending of the dimension of the infinitude of space, [perceiving,] 'Infinite consciousness,' arrive at the dimension of the infinitude of consciousness. This is the sixth station of consciousness.

"There are beings who, with the complete transcending of the dimension of the infinitude of consciousness, [perceiving,] 'There is nothing,' arrive at the dimension of nothingness. This is the seventh station of consciousness.

"The dimension of non-percipient beings and, second, the dimension of neither perception nor non-perception. These are the two dimensions." {DN 15}]

What is ten?

Endowed with ten qualities, one is called an arahant. ["The right view of one beyond training, the right resolve of one beyond training, the right speech of one beyond training, the right action of one beyond training, the right livelihood of one beyond training, the right effort of one beyond training, the right mindfulness of one beyond training, the right concentration of one beyond training, the right knowledge of one beyond training, the right release of one beyond training." {MN 117}][1]

Note

1. The Novice's Questions is one of only two passages in Khp that do not also appear in an identical form elsewhere in the Canon. (The other is passage 8, The Reserve Fund.) However, it is similar to the series of questions presented in AN 10:27–28. For a discussion of the differences among these passages, see Skill in Questions, appendix 2.

Khp 5. Maṅgala Sutta — Protection

I have heard that at one time the Blessed One was staying near Sāvatthī in Jeta's Grove, Anāthapiṇḍika's monastery. Then a certain deva, in the far extreme of the night, her extreme radiance lighting up the entirety of Jeta's Grove, went to the Blessed One. On arrival, having bowed down to him, she stood to one side. As she was standing there, she addressed him with a verse.

"Many devas & human beings
give thought to protection, desiring well-being.
Tell, then, the highest protection."

The Buddha:

"Not consorting with fools,
consorting with the wise,
paying homage to those worthy of homage:
    This is the highest protection.

Living in a civilized land,
having made merit in the past,
directing oneself rightly:[1]
    This is the highest protection.

Broad knowledge, skill,
well-mastered discipline,
well-spoken words:
    This is the highest protection.

Support for one's mother & father,[2]
assistance to one's wife and children, consistency in one's work:
    This is the highest protection.

Generosity, living in rectitude,

assistance to one's relatives,
deeds that are blameless:
    This is the highest protection.

Avoiding, abstaining from evil;
refraining from intoxicants,
being heedful of the mental qualities
    This is the highest protection.

Respect, humility,
contentment, gratitude,
hearing the Dhamma on timely occasions:
    This is the highest protection.

Patience, being easy to instruct,
seeing contemplatives,
discussing the Dhamma on timely occasions:
    This is the highest protection.

Austerity, celibacy,
seeing the noble truths,
realizing unbinding:
    This is the highest protection.

A mind that, when touched
by the ways of the world,[3]
is unshaken, sorrowless, dustless, at rest:
    This is the highest protection.

When acting in this way,
everywhere undefeated,
people go everywhere in well-being:
    This is their highest protection."

Notes

1. These are three of the four "wheels" leading to wealth and prosperity. See AN 4:31.

2. See AN 2:31–32.

Khp 6. Ratana Sutta — Treasures

Whatever spirits have gathered here,
—on the earth, in the sky—
may you all be happy
& listen intently to what I say.

Thus, spirits, you should all be attentive.
Show goodwill to the human race.
Day & night they bring offerings,
so, being heedful, protect them.

Whatever wealth—here or beyond—
whatever exquisite treasure in the heavens,
does not, for us, equal the Tathāgata.
This, too, is an exquisite treasure in the Buddha.
By this truth may there be well-being.

The exquisite deathless—ending, dispassion—
discovered by the Sakyan Sage in concentration:
There is nothing to equal that Dhamma.
This, too, is an exquisite treasure in the Dhamma.
By this truth may there be well-being.

What the excellent Awakened One extolled as pure
and called the concentration
of unmediated knowing:[1]
No equal to that concentration can be found.
This, too, is an exquisite treasure in the Dhamma.
By this truth may there be well-being.

The eight persons—the four pairs—
praised by those at peace:
They, disciples of the One Well-Gone, deserve offerings.
What is given to them bears great fruit.
This, too, is an exquisite treasure in the Saṅgha.

By this truth may there be well-being.

Those who, devoted, firm-minded,
apply themselves to Gotama's message,
on attaining their goal, plunge into the deathless,
freely enjoying the liberation they've gained.
This, too, is an exquisite treasure in the Saṅgha.
By this truth may there be well-being.

An Indra pillar,[2] planted in the earth,
that even the four winds cannot shake:
That, I tell you, is like the person of integrity,
who—having comprehended
the noble truths—sees.
This, too, is an exquisite treasure in the Saṅgha.
By this truth may there be well-being.

Those who have seen clearly the noble truths
well-taught by the one deeply discerning—regardless of what [later] might make them heedless—
will come to no eighth state of becoming.[3]
This, too, is an exquisite treasure in the Saṅgha.
By this truth may there be well-being.

At the moment of attaining sight,
one abandons three things:
identity-views, uncertainty,
& any attachment to habits & practices.[4]
One is completely released
from the four states of deprivation,[5]
and incapable of committing
the six great wrongs.[6]
This, too, is an exquisite treasure in the Saṅgha.
By this truth may there be well-being.

Whatever bad deed one may do
—in body, speech, or in mind—
one cannot hide it:
an incapability ascribed
to one who has seen the Way.

This, too, is an exquisite treasure in the Saṅgha.
By this truth may there be well-being.

Like a forest grove with flowering tops
in the first month of the heat of the summer,
so is the foremost Dhamma he taught,
for the highest benefit, leading to unbinding.
This, too, is an exquisite treasure in the Buddha.
By this truth may there be well-being.

Foremost,
foremost-knowing,
foremost-giving,
foremost-bringing,
unsurpassed, he taught the
foremost Dhamma.
This, too, is an exquisite treasure in the Buddha.
By this truth may there be well-being.

Ended the old, there is no new taking birth.
Dispassioned their minds toward future becoming,
they,
with no seed,
no desire for growth,
the enlightened, go out like this flame.[7]
This, too, is an exquisite treasure in the Saṅgha.
By this truth may there be well-being.

Whatever spirits have gathered here,
—on the earth, in the sky—
let us pay homage to the Buddha,
the Tathāgata worshipped by beings
human & divine.
May there be
well-being.

Whatever spirits have gathered here,
—on the earth, in the sky—
let us pay homage to the Dhamma
the Tathāgata worshipped by beings

human & divine.
    May there be
    well-being.

Whatever spirits have gathered here,
    —on the earth, in the sky—
let us pay homage to the Saṅgha
& the Tathāgata worshipped by devas & human beings.
    May there be
    well-being.

Notes

1. This is apparently equivalent to the liberation of immediacy, mentioned in Thig 5:8, and the concentration that is the fruit of gnosis, mentioned in AN 9:37.

2. Indra-pillar: A tall hardwood pillar, planted at the entrance to a village.

3. The person who has reached this stage in the practice will be reborn at most seven more times. See AN 3:88. On the danger of heedlessness for one who has reached this level of awakening, see SN 55:40.

4. These three qualities are the fetters abandoned when one gains one's first glimpse of unbinding at stream-entry (the moment when one enters the stream to full awakening).

5. Four states of deprivation: rebirth as an animal, a hungry ghost, an angry demon, or a denizen of hell. In the Buddhist cosmology, none of these states is eternal.

6. According to SnA, the six great wrongs are: murdering one's mother, murdering one's father, murdering an arahant (fully awakened individual), wounding a Buddha, causing a schism in the Saṅgha, or choosing anyone other than a Buddha as one's foremost teacher. The first five are listed in AN 5:129 as leading immediately to hell after death.

7. See Thig 5:10.

Khp 7. Tirokuḍḍa Kaṇḍa — (Hungry Ghosts) Outside the Walls

This passage is identical with Pv 1:5.

Outside the walls they stand, & at crossroads.
At doorposts they stand, returning to their old homes.
But when a meal with plentiful food & drink is served,
    no one remembers them:
Such is the kamma of living beings.

So those who feel sympathy for their dead relatives give timely donations of proper food & drink —exquisite, clean—
[thinking:]
        "May this be for our relatives.
        May our relatives be happy!"

And those who have gathered there,
    the assembled shades of the relatives, with appreciation, give their blessing for the plentiful food & drink:
    "May our relatives live long because of whom we have gained [this gift].
    We have been honored,
    and the donors are not without reward!"

For there [in their realm] there's no farming,
    no herding of cattle,
    no commerce,
    no trading with money.

They live on what is given here, hungry ghosts
whose time here is done.

As water raining on a hill flows down to the valley, even so does what is given here benefit the dead.[1]
As rivers full of water fill the ocean full,
even so does what is given here
benefit the dead.

"He gave to me, she acted on my behalf, they were my relatives, companions, friends": Offerings should be given for the dead when one reflects thus on things done in the past.
For
no weeping,
no sorrowing
no other lamentation benefits the dead
whose relatives persist in that way.
But when this offering is given,
well-placed in the Saṅgha, it works for their long-term benefit and they profit immediately.

In this way
the proper duty to relatives has been shown, great honor has been done to the dead, and monks have been given strength:

The merit you've acquired isn't small.[2]

Notes

1. In modern Theravāda merit-making ceremonies, this sentence is the first to be chanted when monks rejoice in the merit of the donors.

2. This passage—beginning with "He gave to me…"—is often chanted when donors are dedicating merit to the recently deceased.

Khp 8. Nidhi Kaṇḍa — The Reserve Fund

A person stashes a fund away deep underground, at the water line:
“When a need or duty arises, this will provide for my needs,
for my release if I’m denounced by the king, molested by thieves,
in case of debt, famine, or accidents.”
With aims like this
    in the world
a reserve fund is stashed away.

But no matter how well it’s stored,
deep underground, at the water line,
it won’t all always serve one’s need.
The fund gets shifted from its place, or one’s memory gets confused;
    or—unseen—
    nāgas make off with it, spirits steal it,
    or hateful heirs run off with it.
When one’s merit’s ended,
it’s totally destroyed.

But when a man or woman has laid aside a well-stored fund of generosity, virtue,
restraint, & self-control,
    with regard to a shrine,
    the Saṅgha,
    a fine individual,
    guests,
    mother, father,

or elder sibling:
That's a well-stored fund.
It can't be wrested away.
It follows you along.
When, having left this world,
for wherever you must go,
you take it with you.
This fund is not held in common with others, & cannot be stolen by thieves.

So, enlightened, you should make merit,
the fund that will follow you along.
This is the fund
that gives all they want to beings human, divine.

Whatever devas aspire to,
that is all gained by this.
A fine complexion, fine voice,
a body well-built, well-formed, lordship, a following:
That is all gained by this.
Earthly kingship, supremacy,
the bliss of an emperor, kingship over devas in the heavens:
That is all gained by this.
The attainment of the human state,
any delight in heaven,
the attainment of unbinding:
That is all gained by this.
Excellent friends, appropriate application,[1] mastery of clear knowing & release[2]:
That is all gained by this.
Acumen,[3] emancipations,[4]
the perfection of disciplehood:
That is all gained by this.
Private awakening,[5]

Buddhahood:
    That is all gained by this.

So powerful this,
    the accomplishment of merit.
Thus the wise, the enlightened, praise the fund of merit already made.

Notes

1. Proper practice of the Dhamma.

2. Clear knowing (vijjā) = knowledge of previous lives, knowledge of the passing away and arising (rebirth) of beings, knowledge of the ending of the [mental] effluents: sensual passion, becoming, and ignorance. Release (vimutti) = release from the cycle of rebirth.

3. Acumen (paṭisambhidā) = acumen with regard to the Dhamma, to its meaning, to language, & to quick-wittedness. These four talents are found in some, but not all, arahants.

4. Vimokkha. DN 15 describes the eight emancipations as follows:

> "Possessed of form, one sees forms. This is the first emancipation.
>
> "Not percipient of form internally, one sees forms externally. This is the second emancipation.
>
> "One is intent only on the beautiful. This is the third emancipation.
>
> "With the complete transcending of perceptions of [physical] form, with the disappearance of perceptions of resistance, and not heeding perceptions of multiplicity, [perceiving,] 'Infinite space,' one enters and remains in the dimension of the infinitude of space. This is the fourth emancipation.
>
> "With the complete transcending of the dimension of the infinitude of space, [perceiving,] 'Infinite consciousness,' one enters and remains in the dimension of the infinitude of consciousness. This is the fifth emancipation.
>
> "With the complete transcending of the dimension of the infinitude of consciousness, [perceiving,] 'There is nothing,' one enters and remains in the dimension of nothingness. This is the sixth emancipation.
> "With the complete transcending of the dimension of nothingness, one enters and remains in the dimension of neither perception nor non-perception. This is the seventh emancipation.

"With the complete transcending of the dimension of neither perception nor non-perception, one enters and remains in the cessation of perception & feeling. This is the eighth emancipation.

"Now, when a monk attains these eight emancipations in forward order, in reverse order, in forward and reverse order, when he attains them and emerges from them wherever he wants, however he wants, and for as long as he wants, when through the ending of the [mental] effluents he enters & remains in the effluent-free awareness-release & discernment-release, directly knowing & realizing them for himself right in the here-&-now, he is said to be a monk released in both ways. And as for another release in both ways, higher or more sublime than this, there is none."

5. Private Awakening: Awakening as a Private Buddha, one who can gain Awakening without relying on the teachings of others, but who cannot formulate the Dhamma in the way a Full Buddha can.

Khp 9. Karaṇīya Mettā Sutta — Goodwill

This is to be done by one skilled in aims appreciating the state of peace:
Be capable, upright, & straightforward,
easy to instruct, gentle, & not conceited,
content & easy to support,
with few duties, living lightly,
with peaceful faculties, astute,
modest, & no greed for supporters.

Do not do the slightest thing
that the observant would later censure.

Think: Happy, at rest,
may all beings be happy at heart.
Whatever beings there may be—
weak or strong, without exception, long, large,
middling, short,
subtle, gross,
seen & unseen,
living near & far away,
born or seeking birth:
May all beings be happy at heart.

Let no one deceive another
or despise anyone anywhere,
or through anger or resistance-perception wish for another to suffer.

As a mother would risk her life
to protect her child, her only child,
even so should one cultivate the heart limitlessly
with regard to all beings.[1]

With goodwill for the entire cosmos,
cultivate the heart limitlessly:
unobstructed, without hostility or hate.

Whether standing, walking,
sitting, or lying down,
as long as one has banished torpor,
one should be determined on this mindfulness.[2]
This is called a Brahmā abiding here.

Not taken with views,
but virtuous & consummate in vision,
having subdued greed for sensuality,
one never again
will lie in the womb.

Notes

1. The image here is sometimes misconstrued as saying that one should protect all beings as a mother would protect her only child. Actually, the parallel is not between the child and all living beings; it is between the child and one's cultivation of the heart: One should protect one's goodwill toward all beings in the same way that a mother would protect her only child. On this point, see MN 21.

2. This line has to be read in line with the Buddha's definition of mindfulness as the ability to keep something in mind. See SN 48:10.

Dhammapada

A Translation

With an Introduction & Notes

Preface

Another translation of the Dhammapada.

Many other English translations are already available–the fingers of at least five people would be needed to count them–so I suppose that a new translation has to be justified, to prove that it's not "just" another one. In doing so, though, I'd rather not criticize the efforts of earlier translators, for I owe them a great deal. Instead, I'll ask you to read the Introduction and Historical Notes, to gain an idea of what is distinctive about the approach I have taken, and the translation itself, which I hope will stand on its own merits. The original impulse for making the translation came from my conviction that the text deserved to be offered freely as a gift of Dhamma. As I knew of no existing translations available as gifts, I made my own.

The explanatory material is designed to meet with the needs of two sorts of readers: those who want to read the text as a text, in the context of the religious history of Buddhism–viewed from the outside–and those who want to read the text as a guide to the personal conduct of their lives. Although there is no clear line dividing these groups, the Introduction is aimed more at the second group, and the Historical Notes more at the first. The End Notes and Glossary contain material that should be of interest to both. Verses marked with an asterisk in the translation are discussed in the End Notes. Pali terms–as well as English terms used in a special sense, such as effluent, enlightened one, fabrication, stress, and Unbinding–when they appear in more than one verse, are explained in the Glossary.

In addition to the previous translators and editors from whose work I have borrowed, I owe a special debt of gratitude to Jeanne Larsen for her help in honing down the language of the translation. Also, John Bullitt, Gil Fronsdal, Charles Hallisey, Karen King, Andrew Olendzki, Ruth Stiles, Clark Strand, Paula Trahan, and Jane Yudelman offered many helpful comments that improved the quality of the book as a whole. Any mistakes that remain, of course, are my own responsibility.

Introduction

The Dhammapada, an anthology of verses attributed to the Buddha, has long been recognized as one of the masterpieces of early Buddhist literature. Only more recently have scholars realized that it is also one of the early masterpieces in the Indian tradition of kavya, or belles lettres.

This translation of the Dhammapada is an attempt to render the verses into English in a way that does justice to both of the traditions to which the text belongs. Although it is tempting to view these traditions as distinct, dealing with form (kavya) and content (Buddhism), the ideals of kavya aimed at combining form and content into a seamless whole. At the same time, the early Buddhists adopted and adapted the conventions of kavya in a way that skillfully dovetailed with their views of how teaching and listening played a role in their path of practice. My hope is that the translation presented here will convey the same seamlessness and skill.

As an example of kavya, the Dhammapada has a fairly complete body of ethical and aesthetic theory behind it, for the purpose of kavya was to instruct in the highest ends of life while simultaneously giving delight. The ethical teaching of the Dhammapada is expressed in the first pair of verses: the mind, through its actions (kamma), is the chief architect of one's happiness and suffering both in this life and beyond. The first three chapters elaborate on this point, to show that there are two major ways of relating to this fact: as a wise person, who is heedful enough to make the necessary effort to train his/her own mind to be a skillful architect; and as a fool, who is heedless and sees no reason to train the mind.

The work as a whole elaborates on this distinction, showing in more detail both the path of the wise person and that of the fool, together with the rewards of the former and the dangers of the latter: the path of the wise person can lead not only to happiness within the cycle of death and rebirth, but also to total escape into the Deathless, beyond the cycle entirely; the path of the fool leads not only to suffering now and in the future, but also to further entrapment within the cycle. The purpose of the Dhammapada is to make the wise path attractive to the reader so that he/she will follow it–for the dilemma posited by the first pair of verses is not one in the imaginary world of fiction; it is the dilemma in which the reader is already placed by the fact of being born.

To make the wise path attractive, the techniques of poetry are used to give "savor" (rasa) to the message. Ancient Indian aesthetic treatises devoted a great deal of discussion to the notion of savor and how it could be conveyed. The basic theory was this: Artistic composition expressed states of emotion or states of mind called "bhava." The standard list of basic emotions included love (delight), humor, grief, anger, energy, fear, disgust, and astonishment. The reader or listener exposed to these presentations of emotion did not participate in them directly; rather, he/she savored them as an aesthetic experience at one remove from the emotion. Thus, the savor of grief is not grief, but compassion. The savor of energy is not energy itself, but admiration for heroism. The savor of love is not love but an experience of sensitivity. The savor of astonishment is a sense of the marvelous. The proof of the indirectness of the aesthetic experience was that some of the basic emotions were decidedly unpleasant, while the savor of the emotion was to be enjoyed.

Although a work of art might depict many emotions, and thus–like a good meal–offer many savors for the reader/listener to taste, one savor was supposed to dominate. Writers made a common practice of announcing the savor they were trying to produce, usually stating in passing that their particular savor was the highest of all. The Dhammapada [354] states explicitly that the savor of Dhamma is the highest savor, which indicates that that is the basic savor of the work. Classic aesthetic theory lists the savor of Dhamma, or justice, as one of the three basic varieties of the heroic savor (the other two deal with generosity and war): thus we would expect the majority of the verses to depict energy, and in fact they do, with their exhortations to action, strong verbs, repeated imperatives, and frequent use of the imagery from battles, races, and conquests.

Dhamma, in the Buddhist sense, implies more than the "justice" of Dhamma in aesthetic theory. However, the long section of the Dhammapada devoted to "The Judge"–beginning with a definition of a good judge, and continuing with examples of good judgment–shows that the Buddhist concept of Dhamma has room for the aesthetic meaning of the term as well.

Classic theory also holds that the heroic savor should, especially at the end of a piece, shade into the marvelous. This, in fact, is what happens periodically throughout the Dhammapada, and especially at the end, where the verses express astonishment at the amazing and paradoxical qualities of a person who has followed the path of heedfulness to its end, becoming "pathless" [92-93; 179-180]–totally indescribable, transcending conflicts and dualities of every sort. Thus the predominant emotions that the verses express in Pali–and should also express in translation–are energy and astonishment, so as to produce qualities of the heroic and marvelous for the reader to savor. This savor is then what inspires the reader to follow the path of wisdom, with the result that he/she will reach a direct experience of the true happiness, transcending all dualities, found at the end of the path.

Classic aesthetic theory lists a variety of rhetorical features that can produce savor. Examples from these lists that can be found in the Dhammapada include: accumulation (padoccaya) [137-140], admonitions (upadista) [47-48, 246-248, et. al.], ambiguity (aksarasamghata) [97, 294-295], benedictions (asis) [337], distinctions (visesana) [19-20, 21-22, 318-319], encouragement (protsahana) [35, 43, 46, et. al.], etymology (nirukta) [388], examples (drstanta) [30], explanations of cause and effect (hetu) [1-2], illustrations (udaharana) [344], implications (arthapatti) [341], rhetorical questions (prccha) [44, 62, 143, et. al.], praise (gunakirtana) [54-56, 58-59, 92-93, et. al.], prohibitions (pratisedha) [121-122, 271-272, 371, et. al.], and ornamentation (bhusana) [passim].

Of these, ornamentation is the most complex, including four figures of speech and ten "qualities." The figures of speech are simile [passim], extended metaphor [398], rhyme (including alliteration and assonance), and "lamps" [passim]. This last figure is a peculiarity of Pali–a heavily inflected language–that allows, say, one adjective to modify two different nouns, or one verb to function in two separate sentences. (The name of the figure derives from the idea that the two nouns radiate from the one adjective, or the two sentences from the one verb.) In English, the closest we have to this is parallelism combined with ellipsis. An example from the translation is in verse 7–

as the wind, a weak tree

–where "overcomes" functions as the verb in both clauses, even though it is elided from the second. This is how I have rendered lamps in most of the verses, although in two cases [174, 206] I found it more effective to repeat the lamp-word.

The ten "qualities" are more general attributes of sound, syntax, and sense, including such attributes as charm, clarity, delicacy, evenness, exaltation, sweetness, and strength. The ancient texts are not especially clear on what some of these terms mean in practice. Even where they are clear, the terms deal in aspects of Pali/Sanskrit syntax not always applicable to English. What is important, though, is that some qualities are seen as more suited to a particular savor than others: strength and exaltation, for example, best convey a taste of the heroic and marvelous. Of these characteristics, strength (ojas) is the easiest to quantify, for it is marked by long compounded words. In the Dhammapada, approximately one tenth of the verses contain compounds that are as long as a whole line of verse, and one verse [39] has three of its four lines made up of such compounds. By the standards of later Sanskrit verse, this is rather mild, but when compared with verses in the rest of the Pali Canon and other early masterpieces of kavya, the Dhammapada is quite strong.

The text also explicitly adds to the theory of characteristics in saying that "sweetness" is not just an attribute of words, but of the person speaking [363]. If the person is a true example of the virtue espoused, his/her words are sweet. This point could be generalized to cover many of the other qualities as well.

Another point from classic aesthetic theory that may be relevant to the Dhammapada is the principle of how a literary work is given unity. Although the text does not provide a step-by-step sequential portrait of the path of wisdom, as a lyric anthology it is much more unified than most Indian examples of that genre. The classic theory of dramatic plot construction may be playing an indirect role here. On the one hand, a plot must exhibit unity by presenting a conflict or dilemma, and depicting the attainment of a goal through overcoming that conflict. This is precisely what unifies the Dhammapada: it begins with the duality between heedless and heedful ways of living, and ends with the final attainment of total mastery. On the other hand, the plot must not show smooth, systematic progress; otherwise the work would turn into a treatise. There must be reversals and diversions to maintain interest. This principle is at work in the fairly unsystematic ordering of the Dhammapada's middle sections. Verses dealing with the beginning stages of the path are mixed together with those dealing with later stages and even stages beyond the completion of the path.

One more point is that the ideal plot should be constructed with a sub-plot in which a secondary character gains his/her goal, and in so doing helps the main character attain his or hers. In addition to the aesthetic pleasure offered by the sub-plot, the ethical lesson is one of human cooperation: people attain their goals by working together. In the Dhammapada, the same dynamic is at work. The main "plot" is that of the person who masters the principle of kamma to the point of total release from kamma and the round of rebirth; the "sub-plot" depicts the person who masters the principle of kamma to the point of gaining a good rebirth on the human or heavenly planes. The second person gains his/her goal, in part, by being generous and respectful to the first person [106-109, 177], thus enabling the first person to practice to the point of total mastery. In return, the first person gives counsel to the second person on how to pursue his/her goal [76-77, 363]. In this way the Dhammapada depicts the play of life in a way that offers two potentially heroic roles for the reader to choose from, and delineates those roles in such a way that all people can choose to be heroic, working together for the attainment of their own true well being.

Perhaps the best way to summarize the confluence of Buddhist and kavya traditions in the Dhammapada is in light of a teaching from another early Buddhist text, the Samyutta Nikaya (SN 55:5), on the factors needed to attain one's first taste of the goal of the Buddhist path. Those factors are four: associating with people of integrity, listening to their teachings, using appropriate attention to inquire into the way those teachings apply to one's life, and practicing in line with the teachings in a way that does them justice. Early Buddhists used the traditions of kavya–concerning savor, rhetoric, structure, and figures of speech–primarily in connection with the second of these factors, in order to make the teachings appealing to the listener. However, the question of savor is related to the other three factors as well. The words of a teaching must be spoken by a person of integrity who embodies their message in his/her actions if their savor is to be sweet [158 , 363]. The listener must reflect on them appropriately and then put them into practice if they are to have more than a passing, superficial taste. Thus both the speaker and listener must act in line with the words of a teaching if it is to bear fruit. This point is reflected in a pair of verses from the Dhammapada itself [51-52]:

> Just like a blossom,
> bright colored
> but scentless:
> a well-spoken word
> is fruitless
> when not carried out.
> Just like a blossom,
> bright colored
> & full of scent:
> a well-spoken word
> is fruitful
> when well carried out.

Appropriate reflection, the first step a listener should follow in carrying out the well-spoken word, means contemplating one's own life to see the dangers of following the path of foolishness and the need to follow the path of wisdom. The Buddhist tradition recognizes two emotions as playing a role in this reflection. The first is samvega, a strong sense of dismay that comes with realizing the futility and meaningless of life as it is normally lived, together with a feeling of urgency in trying to find a way out of the meaningless cycle. The second emotion is pasada, the clarity and serenity that come when one recognizes a teaching that presents the truth of the dilemma of existence and at the same time points the way out. One function of the verses in the Dhammapada is to provide this sense of clarity, which is why verse 82 states that the wise grow serene on hearing the Dhamma, and 102 states that the most worthwhile verse is the meaningful one that, on hearing, brings peace.

However, the process does not stop with these preliminary feelings of peace and serenity. The listener must carry through with the path of practice that the verses recommend. Although much of the impetus for doing so comes from the emotions of samvega and pasada sparked by the content of the verses, the heroic and marvelous savor of the verses plays a role as well, by inspiring the listener to rouse within him or herself the energy and strength that the path will require. When the path is brought to fruition, it brings the peace and delight of the Deathless [373-374]. This is where the process initiated by hearing or reading the Dhamma bears its deepest savor, surpassing all others. It is the highest sense in which the meaningful verses of the Dhammapada bring peace.

In preparing the following translation, I have kept the above points in mind, motivated both by a firm belief in the truth of the message of the Dhammapada, and by a desire to present it in a compelling way that will induce the reader to put it into practice. Although trying to stay as close as possible to the literal meaning of the text, I've also tried to convey its savor. I'm operating on the classic assumption that, although there may be a tension between giving instruction (being scrupulously accurate) and giving delight (providing an enjoyable taste of the mental states that the words depict), the best translation is one that plays with that tension without submitting totally to one side at the expense of the other.

To convey the savor of the work, I have aimed at a spare style flexible enough to express not only its dominant emotions–energy and astonishment–but also its transient emotions, such as humor, delight, and fear. Although the original verses conform to metrical rules, the translations are in free verse. This is the form that requires the fewest deviations from literal accuracy and allows for a terse directness that conforms with the heroic savor of the original. The freedom I have used in placing words on the page also allows many of the poetic effects of Pali syntax–especially the parallelism and ellipsis of the "lamps"–to shine through.

I have been relatively consistent in choosing English equivalents for Pali terms, especially where the terms have a technical meaning. Total consistency, although it may be a logical goal, is by no means a rational one, especially in translating poetry. Anyone who is truly bilingual will appreciate this point. Words in the original were chosen for their sound and connotations, as well as their literal sense, so the same principles–within reasonable limits–have been used in the translation. Deviations from the original syntax are rare, and have been limited primarily to six sorts. The first four are for the sake of immediacy: occasional use of the American "you" for "one"; occasional use of imperatives ("Do this!") for optatives ("One should do this"); substituting active for passive voice; and replacing "he who does this" with "he does this" in many of the verses defining the true brahman in Chapter 26. The remaining two deviations are: making minor adjustments in sentence structure to keep a word at the beginning or end of a verse when this position seems important (e.g., 158, 384); and changing the number from singular ("the wise person") to plural ("the wise") when talking about personality types, both to streamline the language and to lighten the gender bias of the original Pali. (As most of the verses were originally addressed to monks, I have found it impossible to eliminate the gender bias entirely, and so apologize for whatever bias remains.)

In verses where I sense that a particular Pali word or phrase is meant to carry multiple meanings, I have explicitly given all of those meanings in the English, even where this has meant a considerable expansion of the verse. (Many of these verses are discussed in the notes.) Otherwise, I have tried to make the translation as transparent as possible, in order to allow the light and energy of the original to pass through with minimal distortion.

The Dhammapada has for centuries been used as an introduction to the Buddhist point of view. However, the text is by no means elementary, either in terms of content or style. Many of the verses presuppose at least a passing knowledge of Buddhist doctrine; others employ multiple levels of meaning and wordplay typical of polished kavya. For this reason, I have added notes to the translation to help draw out some of the implications of verses that might not be obvious to people who are new to either of the two traditions that the text represents.

I hope that whatever delight you gain from this translation will inspire you to put the Buddha's words into practice, so that you will someday taste the savor, not just of the words, but of the Deathless to which they point.

Dhp I : Pairs

Phenomena are preceded by the heart,
ruled by the heart,
made of the heart.
If you speak or act
with a corrupted heart, then suffering follows you –
as the wheel of the cart, the track of the ox
that pulls it.

Phenomena are
preceded by the heart,
ruled by the heart,
made of the heart.
If you speak or act
with a calm, bright heart, then happiness follows you,
like a shadow
that never leaves.

‘He insulted me,
hit me,

beat me,
robbed me'–
for those who don't brood on this, hostility is stilled.

Hostilities aren't stilled through hostility, regardless.
Hostilities are stilled through non-hostility:
        this, an unending truth.

Unlike those who don't realize that we're here on the verge of perishing,
those who do:
        their quarrels are stilled.

One who stays focused on the beautiful, is unrestrained with the senses,
knowing no moderation in food,
apathetic, unenergetic:
        Mara overcomes him
        as the wind, a weak tree.

One who stays focused on the foul, is restrained with regard to the senses,
knowing moderation in food,
full of conviction & energy: Mara does not overcome him as the wind, a mountain of rock.

doesn't deserve the ochre robe.

But he who is free

well-established in the precepts, truly deserves the ochre robe.

If he recites next to nothing but follows the Dhamma
in line with the Dhamma;
abandoning passion,
aversion, delusion;
alert,
his mind well released,
not clinging
either here or hereafter:
he has his share in the contemplative life.

Dhp II : Heedfulness

Heedfulness:
the path to the Deathless.
Heedlessness:
the path to death.
The heedful do not die.
The heedless are as if already dead.

Knowing this as a true distinction, those wise
in heedfulness
rejoice
in heedfulness,
enjoying the range of the noble ones.

The enlightened, constantly
absorbed in jhana,
persevering,
firm in their effort:
they touch Unbinding,
the unexcelled rest
from the yoke.

Those with initiative,
mindful,
clean in action,
acting with due consideration,
heedful, restrained,
living the Dhamma:
their glory
grows.

*21-24

Through initiative, heedfulness, restraint, & self-control,
the wise would make an island
no flood
can submerge.

25

They're addicted to heedlessness
–dullards, fools–
while one who is wise
cherishes heedfulness
as his highest wealth.

26

Don't give way to heedlessness
or to intimacy
with sensual delight–
for a heedful person,
absorbed in jhana,
attains an abundance of ease.

When the wise person drives out
heedlessness
with heedfulness, having climbed the high tower of discernment,
sorrow-free,
he observes the sorrowing crowd–
as the enlightened man, having scaled
a summit,
the fools on the ground below.

28

Heedful among the heedless, wakeful among those asleep,
just as a fast horse advances, leaving the weak behind:
    so the wise.

Through heedfulness, Indra won to lordship over the devas.
Heedfulness is praised, heedlessness censured–
    always.

30

The monk delighting in heedfulness,
seeing danger in heedlessness,
advances like a fire,
burning fetters
    great & small.

The monk delighting in heedfulness,
seeing danger in heedlessness
–incapable of falling back– stands right on the verge of Unbinding.

31-32

Dhp III : The Mind

Quivering, wavering, hard to guard,
to hold in check:
        the mind.
The sage makes it straight– like a fletcher,
the shaft of an arrow.

Like a fish pulled from its home in the water & thrown on land:
this mind flips & flaps about to escape Mara's sway.

Hard to hold down,
        nimble,
alighting wherever it likes:
        the mind.
Its taming is good.
The mind well-tamed
        brings ease.

So hard to see,
so very, very subtle,
alighting wherever it likes:
        the mind.
The wise should guard it.
The mind protected
        brings ease.

Wandering far,
going alone,

bodiless,
lying in a cave:
    the mind.
Those who restrain it:
    from Mara's bonds
    they'll be freed.

For a person of unsteady mind, not knowing true Dhamma, serenity
    set adrift:
discernment doesn't grow full.

38

For a person of unsoddened mind, unassaulted awareness,
abandoning merit & evil, wakeful,
there is no danger
        no fear.

*39

Knowing this body
    is like a clay jar, securing this mind
    like a fort,
        attack Mara
    with the spear of discernment, then guard what's won
    without settling there, without laying claim.

All too soon, this body will lie on the ground cast off,
bereft of consciousness,
like a useless scrap
        of wood.

Whatever an enemy might do to an enemy,
or a foe to a foe,
the ill-directed mind
can do to you
        even worse.

Whatever a mother, father
or other kinsman
might do for you,
the well-directed mind
can do for you
        even better.

*42-43

Dhp IV : Blossoms

Who will penetrate this earth & this realm of death
with all its gods?
Who will ferret out
the well-taught Dhamma-saying,
as the skillful flower-arranger
        the flower?

The learner-on-the-path will penetrate this earth & this realm of death
with all its gods.
The learner-on-the-path
will ferret out
the well-taught Dhamma-saying,
as the skillful flower-arranger
        the flower.

Knowing this body
is like foam,
realizing its nature
        –a mirage–
cutting out
the blossoms of Mara, you go where the King of Death can't see.

The man immersed in gathering blossoms,

his heart distracted:
death sweeps him away–
        as a great flood,
        a village asleep.

The man immersed in
gathering blossoms,
his heart distracted,
insatiable in sensual pleasures:
the End-Maker holds him under his sway.

*47-48

As a bee–without harming
        the blossom,
        its color,
        its fragrance–
takes its nectar & flies away:
so should the sage go through a village.

Focus,
not on the rudenesses of others, not on what they've done or left undone,
but on what you have & haven't done
        yourself.

50

Just like a blossom,
bright colored
        but scentless:
a well-spoken word
        is fruitless

when not carried out.

Just like a blossom,
bright colored
        & full of scent:
a well-spoken word
        is fruitful
when well carried out.

51-52

Just as from a heap of flowers many garland strands can be made, even so
one born & mortal should do
–with what's born & is mortal– many a skillful thing.

No flower's scent
goes against the wind–
        not sandalwood,
                jasmine,
                tagara.
But the scent of the good does go against the wind.
The person of integrity wafts a scent
in every direction.

Sandalwood, tagara,
lotus, & jasmine:
        among these scents,
        the scent of virtue
        is unsurpassed.

Next to nothing, this scent

–sandalwood, tagara–
while the scent of virtuous conduct wafts to the devas, supreme.

*54-56

Those consummate in virtue, dwelling
        in heedfulness,
released
        through right knowing:
Mara can't follow their tracks.

*57

As in a pile of rubbish cast by the side of a highway a lotus might grow clean-smelling
        pleasing the heart,
so in the midst of the rubbish-like,
people run-of-the-mill & blind, there dazzles with discernment
        the disciple of the Rightly Self-Awakened One.

58-59

Dhp V : Fools

Long for the wakeful is the night.
Long for the weary, a league.
For fools unaware of True Dhamma, samsara
is long.

60

If, in your course, you don't meet your equal, your better, then continue your course, firmly,
alone.
There's no fellowship with fools.

61

'I have sons, I have wealth'– the fool torments himself.
When even he himself doesn't belong to himself, how then sons?
How wealth?

A fool with a sense of his foolishness is–at least to that extent–wise.
But a fool who thinks himself wise really deserves to be called a fool.

63

Even if for a lifetime
the fool stays with the wise, he knows nothing of the Dhamma–
as the ladle,
the taste of the soup.

Even if for a moment,
the perceptive person stays with the wise, he immediately knows the Dhamma–
as the tongue,
the taste of the soup.

Fools, their wisdom weak, are their own enemies
as they go through life, doing evil
that bears bitter fruit.

66

It's not good,
the doing of the deed
that, once it's done,
you regret,
whose result you reap crying,
your face in tears.

It's good,
the doing of the deed
that, once it's done,
you don't regret,
whose result you reap gratified, happy at heart.

67-68

As long as evil has yet to ripen, the fool mistakes it for honey.
But when that evil ripens, the fool falls into pain.

69

Month after month
the fool might eat
only a tip-of-grass measure of food, but he wouldn't be worth
one sixteenth
of those who've fathomed the Dhamma.

70

An evil deed, when done, doesn't–like ready milk–
come out right away.
It follows the fool, smoldering
like a fire hidden in ashes.

Only for his ruin
does renown come to the fool.
It ravages his bright fortune & rips his head apart.

He would want unwarranted status, preeminence among monks, authority
among monasteries,

homage
        from lay families.

‘Let householders & those gone forth both think that this was done by me alone.
May I alone determine what’s a duty, what’s not’:
        the resolve of a fool
        as they grow–
                his desire & pride.

The path to material gain goes one way,
the way to Unbinding,
        another.
Realizing this, the monk,
a disciple to the Awakened One, shouldn’t relish offerings, should cultivate seclusion instead.

Dhp VI : The Wise

Regard him as one who points out
        treasure,
the wise one who seeing your faults
        rebukes you.
Stay with this sort of sage.
For the one who stays
with a sage of this sort,
        things get better,
        not worse.

Let him admonish, instruct,
        deflect you
away from poor manners.
To the good, he's endearing;
to the bad, he's not.

76-77

Don't associate with bad friends.
Don't associate with the low.
Associate with admirable friends.
Associate with the best.

Drinking the Dhamma, refreshed by the Dhamma, one sleeps at ease
with clear awareness & calm.
In the Dhamma revealed
by the noble ones,

the wise person
        always delights.

*79

Irrigators guide
                the water.
Fletchers shape
                the arrow shaft.
Carpenters shape
                the wood.
The wise control
                themselves.

80

As a single slab of rock won't budge in the wind, so the wise are not moved by praise,
        by blame.

81

Like a deep lake,
clear, unruffled, & calm:
so the wise become clear,
        calm,
on hearing words of the Dhamma.

82

Everywhere, truly,
those of integrity
        stand apart.
They, the good,
don't chatter in hopes of favor or gains.
When touched

now by pleasure,
now pain,
the wise give no sign of high or low.

One who wouldn't– not for his own sake nor that of another–
hanker for wealth,
a son,
a kingdom,
his own fulfillment,
by unrighteous means:
he is righteous, rich
in virtue, discernment.

Few are the people who reach the Far Shore.
These others simply scurry along this shore.

But those who practice Dhamma in line with the well-taught Dhamma, will cross over the realm of Death
so hard to transcend.

Forsaking dark practices,
the wise person
should develop the bright, having gone from home

to no-home
in seclusion, so hard to enjoy.

There he should wish for delight, discarding sensuality–
he who has nothing.
He should cleanse himself–wise– of what defiles the mind.

Whose minds are well-developed in the factors for self-awakening, who delight in non-clinging, relinquishing grasping– resplendent,
their effluents ended:
they, in the world,
are Unbound.

*85-89

Dhp VII : Arahants

In one who has gone the full distance, is free from sorrow,
is everywhere
fully released,
has abandoned all bonds:
no fever is found.

The mindful keep active, don't delight in settling back.
They renounce every home,
every home,
like swans taking off from a lake.

Not hoarding,
having comprehended food,
their pasture–emptiness & freedom without sign:
their course,
like that of birds through space,
can't be traced.

Effluents ended,
independent of nutriment,
their pasture–emptiness & freedom without sign:
their trail,
like that of birds through space,
can't be traced.

*92-93

He whose senses are steadied like stallions
well-trained by the charioteer, his conceit abandoned,
free of effluent,
Such:
even devas adore him.

Like the earth, he doesn't react– cultured,
Such,
like Indra's pillar,
like a lake free of mud.
For him
–Such–
there's no traveling on.

Calm is his mind,
calm his speech & his deed:
one who's released through right knowing,
pacified,
Such.

*94-96

The man
faithless / beyond conviction ungrateful / knowing the Unmade a burglar / who has severed connections who's destroyed
his chances / conditions who eats vomit: / has disgorged expectations:
the ultimate person.

In village or wilds,
valley, plateau:
that place is delightful
where arahants dwell.

98

Delightful wilds
where the crowds don't delight, those free from passion
        delight,
for they're not searching for sensual pleasures.

99

Dhp VIII : Thousands

Better
than if there were thousands of meaningless words is one meaningful word
that on hearing
brings peace.

Better
than if there were thousands
of meaningless verses is
one meaningful line of verse
that on hearing
brings peace.

And better than chanting hundreds
of meaningless verses is
one Dhamma-saying
that on hearing
brings peace.

*100-102

Greater in battle
than the man who would conquer a thousand-thousand men, is he who would conquer just one–

himself.

Better to conquer yourself than others.

When you've trained yourself, living in constant self-control, neither a deva nor gandhabba, nor a Mara banded with Brahmas, could turn that triumph back into defeat.

103-105

You could, month by month,
at a cost of thousands, conduct sacrifices
a hundred times,
or
pay a single moment's homage
to one person,
self-cultivated.
Better than a hundred years of sacrifices
would that act of homage be.

You could, for a hundred years, live in a forest
tending a fire,
or
pay a single moment's homage
to one person,
self-cultivated.
Better than a hundred years of sacrifices
would that act of homage be.

Everything offered or sacrificed in the world for an entire year by one seeking merit doesn't come to a fourth.

Better to pay respect to those who've gone
the straight way.

*106-108

If you're respectful by habit, constantly honoring the worthy,
four things increase:
long life, beauty,
happiness, strength.

109

Better than a hundred years lived without virtue, uncentered, is
one day
lived by a virtuous person
absorbed in jhana.

And better than a hundred years lived undiscerning, uncentered, is
one day
lived by a discerning person
absorbed in jhana.

And better than a hundred years lived apathetic & unenergetic, is
one day
lived energetic & firm.

And better than a hundred years
lived without seeing arising & passing away, is
one day
lived seeing arising & passing away.

And better than a hundred years

lived without seeing the Deathless state, is
        one day
lived seeing
the Deathless state.

And better than a hundred years
lived without seeing the ultimate Dhamma, is
        one day
lived seeing
the ultimate Dhamma.

110-115

Dhp IX : Evil

Be quick in doing
what's admirable.
Restrain your mind
from what's evil.
When you're slow
in making merit,
evil delights the mind.

116

If a person does evil,
he shouldn't do it again & again, shouldn't develop a penchant for it.
To accumulate evil brings pain.

If a person makes merit,
he should do it again & again, should develop a penchant for it.
To accumulate merit
        brings ease.

117-118

Even the evil
meet with good fortune
as long as their evil
has yet to mature.
But when it's matured
that's when they meet
        with evil.

Even the good

meet with bad fortune
as long as their good
has yet to mature.
But when it's matured
that's when they meet
        with good fortune.

119-120

Don't underestimate evil
('It won't amount to much').
A water jar fills,
even with water
falling in drops.
With evil–even if bit
            by bit, habitually–
the fool fills himself full.

Don't underestimate merit
('It won't amount to much').
A water jar fills,
even with water
falling in drops.
With merit–even if bit
            by bit,
        habitually–
the enlightened one fills himself full.

*121-122

Like a merchant with a small but well-laden caravan
                –a dangerous road,

like a person who loves life
–a poison,
one should avoid
–evil deeds.

123

If there's no wound on the hand, that hand can hold poison.
Poison won't penetrate
where there's no wound.
There's no evil
for those who don't do it.

124

Whoever harasses
an innocent man,
a man pure, without blemish:
the evil comes right back to the fool
like fine dust
thrown against the wind.

125

Some are born
in the human womb, evildoers
in hell,
those on the good course go
to heaven,
while those without effluent:
totally unbound.

*126

Not up in the air,
nor in the middle of the sea,
nor going into a cleft in the mountains

–nowhere on earth–
is a spot to be found
where you could stay & escape your evil deed.

Not up in the air,
nor in the middle of the sea,
nor going into a cleft in the mountains
–nowhere on earth–
is a spot to be found
where you could stay & not succumb to death.

127-128

Dhp X : The Rod

All
tremble at the rod,
all
are fearful of death.
Drawing the parallel to
yourself,
neither kill nor get others to kill.

All
tremble at the rod,
all
hold their life dear.
Drawing the parallel to
yourself,
neither kill nor get others to kill.

129-130

Whoever takes a rod
to harm living beings desiring ease,
when he himself is looking for ease,
meets with no ease after death.

Whoever doesn't take a rod
to harm living beings desiring ease,
when he himself is looking for ease,
meets with ease after death.

131-132

Speak harshly to no one, or the words will be thrown right back at you.

Contentious talk is painful, for you get struck by rods in return.

If, like a flattened metal pot
you don't resound, you've attained an Unbinding;
in you there's found no contention.

133-134

As a cowherd with a rod drives cows to the field, so aging & death
drive the life
of living beings.

135

When doing evil deeds,
the fool is oblivious.
The dullard
is tormented
by his own deeds,
as if burned by a fire.

136

Whoever, with a rod,
harasses an innocent man, unarmed, quickly falls into any of ten things:

harsh pains, devastation, a broken body, grave illness, mental derangement, trouble with the government, violent slander, relatives lost, property dissolved, houses burned down.

At the break-up of the body
this one with no discernment, reappears in hell.

137-140

Neither nakedness nor matted hair nor mud nor the refusal of food nor sleeping on the bare ground nor dust & dirt nor squatting austerities cleanses the mortal who's not gone beyond doubt.

If, though adorned, one lives in tune with the chaste life
–calmed, tamed, & assured– having put down the rod toward all beings, he's a contemplative
    a brahman
    a monk.

141-142

Who in the world
is a man constrained by conscience, who awakens to censure
like a fine stallion to the whip?

*143

Like a fine stallion struck with a whip,
be ardent & chastened.
Through conviction
    virtue, persistence,
    concentration, judgment, consummate in knowledge & conduct,
    mindful,
you'll abandon this not-insignificant pain.

144

Irrigators guide
the water.
Fletchers shape
the arrow shaft.
Carpenters shape
the wood.
Those of good practices control themselves.

145

Dhp XI : Aging

What laughter, why joy, when constantly aflame?
        Enveloped in darkness,
don't you look for a lamp?

146

Look at the beautified image,
a heap of festering wounds, shored up:
ill, but the object
        of many resolves,
where there is nothing
        lasting or sure.

147

Worn out is this body,
a nest of diseases, dissolving.
This putrid conglomeration is bound to break up,
for life is hemmed in with death.

148

On seeing these bones discarded
like gourds in the fall, pigeon-gray:
                what delight?

149

A city made of bones,
plastered over with flesh & blood, whose hidden treasures are:

pride & contempt,
aging & death.

150

Even royal chariots
well-embellished get run down,
and so does the body
succumb to old age.
But the Dhamma of the good doesn't succumb to old age:
the good let the civilized know.

151

This unlistening man
matures like an ox.
His muscles develop,
his discernment not.

*152

Through the round of many births I roamed
without reward,
without rest,
seeking the house-builder.
Painful is birth again
& again.

House-builder, you're seen!
You will not build a house again.
All your rafters broken,
the ridge pole dismantled, immersed in dismantling, the mind has attained to the end of craving.

*153-154

Neither living the chaste life
nor gaining wealth in their youth, they waste away like old herons in a dried-up lake depleted of fish.

Neither living the chaste life
nor gaining wealth in their youth, they lie around,
misfired from the bow,
sighing over old times.

155-156

Dhp XII : Self

If you hold yourself dear then guard, guard yourself well.
The wise person would stay awake nursing himself
in any of the three watches of the night, the three stages of life.

        First he'd settle himself
in what is correct, only then
teach others.
He wouldn't stain his name
                : he is wise.

158

If you'd mold yourself
the way you teach others, then, well-trained,
go ahead & tame–
        for, as they say,
what's hard to tame is you yourself.

Your own self is
your own mainstay,
for who else could your mainstay be?
With you yourself well-trained you obtain the mainstay hard to obtain.

160

The evil he himself has done
–self-born, self-created– grinds down the dullard, as a diamond, a precious stone.

161

When overspread by extreme vice– like a sal tree by a vine– you do to yourself
what an enemy would wish.

*162

They're easy to do– things of no good & no use to yourself.
What's truly useful & good is truly harder than hard to do.

163

The teaching of those who live the Dhamma, worthy ones, noble:
whoever maligns it
        –a dullard,
        inspired by evil view–
bears fruit for his own destruction, like the fruiting of the bamboo.

        Evil is done
                by oneself,
                by oneself is one defiled.

Evil is left undone
by oneself,
by oneself is one cleansed.
Purity & impurity are one's own doing.
No one purifies another.
No other purifies one.

*165

Don't sacrifice your own welfare for that of another,
no matter how great.
Realizing your own true welfare, be intent on just that.

*166

Dhp XIII : Worlds

Don't associate with lowly qualities.
Don't consort with heedlessness.
Don't associate with wrong views.
Don't busy yourself with the world.

167

Get up! Don't be heedless.
Live the Dhamma well.
One who lives the Dhamma
    sleeps with ease
in this world & the next.

Live the Dhamma well.
Don't live it badly.
One who lives the Dhamma
    sleeps with ease
in this world & the next.

168-169

See it as a bubble,
see it as a mirage:
one who regards the world this way the King of Death doesn't see.

*170

Come look at this world all decked out
like a royal chariot,
where fools plunge in,
while those who know

don't cling.

171

Who once was heedless,
but later is not,
brightens the world
like the moon set free from a cloud.

His evil-done deed
is replaced with skillfulness:
he brightens the world
like the moon set free from a cloud.

172-173

Blinded this world–
how few here see clearly!
Just as birds who've escaped from a net are few, few are the people who make it to heaven.

174

Swans fly the path of the sun;
those with the power fly through space;
the enlightened flee from the world, having defeated the armies of Mara.

175

The person who tells a lie,
who transgresses in this one thing,
transcending concern for the world beyond:
there's no evil
he might not do.

*176

No misers go to the world of the devas.
Those who don't praise giving are fools.
The enlightened
express their approval for giving and so find ease
    in the world beyond.

177

Sole dominion over the earth, going to heaven,
lordship over all worlds:
    the fruit of stream entry excels them.

*178

Dhp XIV : Awakened

Whose conquest can't be undone, whose conquest no one in the world can reach;
awakened, his pasture endless,
        pathless:
by what path will you lead him astray?

In whom there's no craving
–the sticky ensnarer–
to lead him anywherever at all;
awakened, his pasture endless,
        pathless:
by what path will you lead him astray?

179-180

They, the enlightened, intent on jhana, delighting in stilling & renunciation, self-awakened & mindful:
        even the devas
        view them with envy.

181

Hard the winning of a human birth.
Hard the life of mortals.
Hard the chance to hear the true Dhamma.
Hard the arising of Awakened Ones.

182

The non-doing

of any evil,
the performance
of what's skillful,
the cleansing
of one's own mind:
this is the teaching
of the Awakened.

Patient endurance:
the foremost austerity.
Unbinding:
the foremost,
so say the Awakened.
He who injures another
is no contemplative.
He who mistreats another,
no monk.

Not disparaging, not injuring,
restraint
in line with the Patimokkha, moderation
in food,
dwelling in seclusion,
commitment to the heightened mind:
this is the teaching
of the Awakened.

*183-185

Not even if it rained gold coins would we have our fill of sensual pleasures.
'Stressful,
they give little enjoyment'– knowing this, the wise one finds no delight
even in heavenly sensual pleasures.

He is one who delights
in the ending of craving,
a disciple of the Rightly Self-Awakened One.

186-187

They go to many a refuge, to mountains & forests,
to park & tree shrines:
people threatened with danger.
That's not the secure refuge,
not the supreme refuge,
that's not the refuge,
having gone to which,
you gain release
from all suffering & stress.
But when, having gone to the Buddha, Dhamma, & Sangha for refuge,
you see with right discernment
the four noble truths–
stress,
the cause of stress,
the transcending of stress,
& the noble eightfold path,
the way to the stilling of stress:
that's the secure refuge,
that, the supreme refuge,
that is the refuge,
having gone to which,
you gain release
from all suffering & stress.

*188-192

It's hard to come by a thoroughbred of a man.

It's simply not true
that he's born everywhere.
Wherever he's born, an enlightened one,
the family prospers,
is happy.

193

A blessing: the arising of Awakened Ones.
A blessing: the teaching of true Dhamma.
A blessing: the concord of the Sangha.
The austerity of those in concord is a blessing.

194

If you worship those worthy of worship, –Awakened Ones or their disciples– who've transcended objectification, crossed over lamentation & grief,
who are unendangered,
fearless,
unbound:
there's no measure for reckoning that your merit's 'this much.'

*195-196

Dhp XV : Happy

How very happily we live, free from hostility
among those who are hostile.
Among hostile people,
free from hostility we dwell.

How very happily we live,
free from misery
among those who are miserable.
Among miserable people, free from misery we dwell.

How very happily we live,
free from busyness
among those who are busy.
Among busy people,
free from busyness we dwell.

How very happily we live,
we who have nothing.
We will feed on rapture like the Radiant gods.

197-200

Winning gives birth to hostility.
Losing, one lies down in pain.
The calmed lie down with ease, having set winning & losing aside.

201

There's no fire like passion,
no loss like anger,
no pain like the aggregates, no ease other than peace.

Hunger: the foremost illness.
Fabrications: the foremost pain.
For one knowing this truth
as it has come to be,
        Unbinding
is the foremost ease.

Freedom from illness: the foremost good fortune.
Contentment: the foremost wealth.
Trust: the foremost kinship.
Unbinding: the foremost ease.

202-204

Drinking the nourishment, the flavor,
of seclusion & calm,
one is freed from evil, devoid
        of distress,
refreshed with the nourishment of rapture in the Dhamma.

205

It's good to see Noble Ones.
Happy their company–always.
Through not seeing fools constantly, constantly one would be happy.

For, living with a fool,
one grieves a long time.
Painful is communion with fools, as with an enemy–

always.
Happy is communion
with the enlightened,
as with a gathering of kin.

So:
the enlightened man–
discerning, learned,
enduring, dutiful, noble, intelligent, a man of integrity:
follow him
–one of this sort–
as the moon, the path of the zodiac stars.

206-208

Dhp XVI : Dear Ones

Having applied himself to what was not his own task, and not having applied himself to what was,
having disregarded the goal to grasp at what he held dear, he now envies those who kept after themselves, took themselves
                to task.

*209

Don't ever–regardless– be conjoined with what's dear or undear.
It's painful
not to see what's dear
or to see what's not.

So don't make anything dear, for it's dreadful to be far from what's dear.
No bonds are found
for those for whom there's neither dear
nor undear.

210-211

From what's dear is born grief, from what's dear is born fear.

For one freed from what's dear
there's no grief
–so how fear?

From what's loved is born grief,
from what's loved is born fear.
For one freed from what's loved
there's no grief
–so how fear?

From delight is born grief,
from delight is born fear.
For one freed from delight
there's no grief
–so how fear?

From sensuality is born grief,
from sensuality is born fear.
For one freed from sensuality
there's no grief
–so how fear?

From craving is born grief,
from craving is born fear.
For one freed from craving
there's no grief
–so how fear?

212-216

One consummate in virtue & vision,
judicious,
speaking the truth,
doing his own task:
the world holds him dear.

217

If

you've given birth to a wish for what can't be expressed, are suffused with heart, your mind not enmeshed
in sensual passions:
        you're said to be in the up-flowing stream.

*218

A man long absent
comes home safe from afar.
His kin, his friends, his companions, delight in his return.

In just the same way,
when you've done good & gone from this world
        to the world beyond,
your good deeds receive you– as kin, someone dear
        come home.

219-220

Dhp XVII : Anger

Abandon anger,
be done with conceit,
get beyond every fetter.
When for name & form
you have no attachment
–have nothing at all–
no sufferings, no stresses, invade.

221

When anger arises,
whoever keeps firm control
as if with a racing chariot:
him
I call a master charioteer.
Anyone else,
a rein-holder–
that's all.

222

Conquer anger
with lack of anger;
bad with good;
stinginess with a gift;
a liar with truth.

223

By telling the truth;
by not growing angry;
by giving, when asked,
no matter how little you have:

by these three things
you enter the presence of devas.

224

Gentle sages, constantly restrained in body,
go to the unwavering state
where, having gone,
there's no grief.

225

Those who always stay wakeful, training by day & by night,
keen on Unbinding:
their effluents come to an end.

226

This has come down from old, Atula, & not just from today:
they find fault with one who sits silent,
they find fault with one who speaks a great deal,
they find fault with one who measures his words.
There's no one unfaulted in the world.

There never was,
    will be,
nor at present is found anyone entirely faulted or entirely praised.

227-228

If knowledgeable people praise him, having observed him

day after day
to be blameless in conduct, intelligent, endowed with discernment & virtue:
like an ingot of gold–
who's fit to find fault with him?
Even devas praise him.
Even by Brahma he's praised.

229-230

Guard against anger
erupting in body;
in body, be restrained.
Having abandoned bodily misconduct, live conducting yourself well
in body.

Guard against anger
erupting in speech;
in speech, be restrained.
Having abandoned verbal misconduct, live conducting yourself well
in speech.

Guard against anger
erupting in mind;
in mind, be restrained.
Having abandoned mental misconduct, live conducting yourself well
in mind.

Those restrained in body
–the enlightened–
restrained in speech & in mind
–enlightened–
are the ones whose restraint is secure.

Dhp XVIII : Impurities

You are now
like a yellowed leaf.
Already
Yama's minions stand near.
You stand at the door to departure but have yet to provide for the journey.

Make an island for yourself!
Work quickly! Be wise!
With impurities all blown away,
unblemished,
you'll reach the divine realm
of the noble ones.

You are now
right at the end of your time.
You are headed to Yama's presence,
with no place to rest along the way,
but have yet to provide
for the journey.

Make an island for yourself!
Work quickly! Be wise!
With impurities all blown away,
unblemished,
you won't again undergo birth & aging.

*235-238

Just as a silver smith

step by step, bit by bit, moment to moment,
blows away the impurities of molten silver–
so the wise man, his own.

239

Just as rust
–iron's impurity–
eats the very iron
from which it is born,
        so the deeds
of one who lives slovenly lead him on to a bad destination.

*240

No recitation: the ruinous impurity of chants.
No initiative: of a household.
Indolence: of beauty.
Heedlessness: of a guard.

In a woman, misconduct is an impurity.
In a donor, stinginess.
Evil deeds are the real impurities
in this world & the next.

More impure than these impurities is the ultimate impurity:
        ignorance.
Having abandoned this impurity, monks, you're impurity-free.

241-243

Life's easy to live
for someone unscrupulous, cunning as a crow,
corrupt, back-biting,
forward, & brash;
but for someone who's constantly scrupulous, cautious, observant, sincere,
pure in his livelihood,
clean in his pursuits,
it's hard.

244-245

Whoever kills, lies, steals, goes to someone else's wife, & is addicted to intoxicants, digs himself up
by the root
right here in this world.

So know, my good man,
that bad deeds are reckless.
Don't let greed & unrighteousness oppress you with long-term pain.

246-248

People give in line with their faith, in line with conviction.
Whoever gets flustered at food & drink given to others, attains no concentration
by day or by night.

But one in whom this is

cut through
up-rooted wiped out–
attains concentration
by day or by night.

249-250

There's no fire like passion,
no seizure like anger,
no snare like delusion,
no river like craving.

It's easy to see
the errors of others,
but hard to see
your own.
You winnow like chaff
the errors of others,
but conceal your own–
like a cheat, an unlucky throw.

If you focus on the errors of others, constantly finding fault,
your effluents flourish.
You're far from their ending.

252-253

There's no trail in space,
no outside contemplative.
People are smitten
with objectification,
but devoid of objectification are the Tathagatas.

There's no trail in space,

no outside contemplative,
no eternal fabrications, no wavering in the Awakened.

*254-255

Dhp XIX : The Judge

To pass judgment hurriedly doesn't mean you're a judge.
The wise one, weighing both the right judgment & wrong, judges others impartially– unhurriedly, in line with the Dhamma, guarding the Dhamma,
guarded by Dhamma,
intelligent:
he's called a judge.

*256-257

Simply talking a lot
doesn't mean one is wise.
Whoever's secure–
no
hostility,
fear–
is said to be wise.

Simply talking a lot
doesn't maintain the Dhamma.
Whoever
–although he's heard next to nothing– sees Dhamma through his body, is not heedless of Dhamma:
he's one who maintains the Dhamma.

*258-259

A head of gray hairs doesn't mean one's an elder.

Advanced in years,
one's called an old fool.

But one in whom there is truth, restraint,
rectitude, gentleness,
self-control–
he's called an elder,
his impurities disgorged,
enlightened.

260-261

Not by suave conversation or lotus-like coloring does an envious, miserly cheat become an exemplary man.

But one in whom this is
cut through
up-rooted
wiped out–
he's called exemplary,
his aversion disgorged, intelligent.

262-263

A shaven head
doesn't mean a contemplative.
The liar observing no duties, filled with greed & desire:
what kind of contemplative's he?

But whoever tunes out the dissonance
of his evil qualities
–large or small–
in every way

by bringing evil to consonance:
        he's called a contemplative.

*264-265

Begging from others doesn't mean one's a monk.
As long as one follows
householders' ways,
one is no monk at all.

But whoever puts aside
both merit & evil and,
living the chaste life, judiciously
goes through the world:
        he's called a monk.

266-267

Not by silence
does someone confused & unknowing
turn into a sage.

But whoever–wise,
as if holding the scales, taking the excellent–
        rejects evil deeds:
he is a sage,
that's how he's a sage.
Whoever can weigh
both sides of the world:
        that's how he's called a sage.

*268-269

Not by harming life

does one become noble.
One is termed noble for being gentle
to all living things.

270

Monk, don't on account of your habits & practices, great erudition,
concentration attainments, secluded dwelling,
or the thought, 'I touch the renunciate ease that run-of-the-mill people don't know':
ever let yourself get complacent when the ending of effluents is still unattained.

*271-272

Dhp XX : The Path

Of paths, the eightfold is best.
Of truths, the four sayings.
Of qualities, dispassion.
Of two-footed beings,
        the one with the eyes
        to see.

*273

        Just this is the path
–there is no other–
to purify vision.
        Follow it,
and that will be Mara's bewilderment.

Following it,
you put an end
to suffering & stress.
I have taught you this path having known
        –for your knowing–
the extraction of arrows.

It's for you to strive ardently.
Tathagatas simply point out the way.
Those who practice,
absorbed in jhana:
        from Mara's bonds

they'll be freed.

*274-276

When you see with discernment,
'All fabrications are inconstant'–
you grow disenchanted with stress.
This is the path
to purity.

When you see with discernment,
'All fabrications are stressful'–
you grow disenchanted with stress.
This is the path
to purity.

When you see with discernment,
'All phenomena are not-self'–
you grow disenchanted with stress.
This is the path
to purity.

277-279

At the time for initiative he takes no initiative.
Young, strong, but lethargic, the resolves of his heart exhausted,
the lazy, lethargic one loses the path
to discernment.

280

Guarded
in speech,
well-restrained
in mind,

you should do nothing unskillful
in body.
Purify
these three courses of action.
Bring to fruition
the path that seers have proclaimed.

281

From striving comes wisdom;
from not, wisdom's end.
Knowing these two courses
–to development, decline–
conduct yourself
so that wisdom will grow.

282

Cut down
the forest of desire,
not the forest of trees.
From the forest of desire come danger & fear.
Having cut down this forest & its underbrush, monks, be deforested.

For as long as the least bit of underbrush
of a man for women
is not cleared away,
the heart is fixated
like a suckling calf
on its mother.

Crush
your sense of self-allure like an autumn lily in the hand.

Nurture only the path to peace
–Unbinding–
as taught by the One Well Gone.

*283-285

‘Here I’ll stay for the rains.
Here, for the summer & winter.’
So imagines the fool, unaware of obstructions.

That drunk-on-his-sons-&-cattle man, all tangled up in the mind:
death sweeps him away–
as a great flood,
a village asleep.

There are no sons
to give shelter,
no father,
no family
for one seized by the Ender, no shelter among kin.

Realizing
this force of reasoning,
the wise man, restrained by virtue, should make the path pure –right away–
that goes all the way to Unbinding.

*286-289

Dhp XXI : Miscellany

If, by forsaking
a limited ease,
he would see
an abundance of ease,
the enlightened man
would forsake
the limited ease
for the sake of the abundant.

290

He wants his own ease
by giving others dis-ease.
Intertwined in the interaction of hostility, from hostility
he's not set free.

291

In those who reject what should,
& do what shouldn't be done –heedless, insolent– effluents grow.

But for those who are well-applied, constantly, to mindfulness immersed in the body;
don't indulge
in what shouldn't be done; & persist

in what should
–mindful, alert–
effluents come to an end.

*292-293

Having killed mother & father,
two warrior kings,
the kingdom & its dependency–
the brahman, untroubled, travels on.

Having killed mother & father,
two learned kings, &, fifth, a tiger–
the brahman, untroubled, travels on.

*294-295

They awaken, always wide awake:
Gotama's disciples
whose mindfulness, both day & night,
is constantly immersed
in the Buddha.

They awaken, always wide awake:
Gotama's disciples
whose mindfulness, both day & night,
is constantly immersed
in the Dhamma.

They awaken, always wide awake:
Gotama's disciples
whose mindfulness, both day & night,
is constantly immersed
in the Sangha.

They awaken, always wide awake:
Gotama's disciples
whose mindfulness, both day & night,

is constantly immersed
in the body.

They awaken, always wide awake:
Gotama's disciples
whose hearts delight, both day & night,
in harmlessness.

They awaken, always wide awake:
Gotama's disciples
whose hearts delight, both day & night,
in developing the mind.

*296-301

Hard
is the life gone forth, hard to delight in.
Hard
is the miserable
householder's life.
It's painful
to stay with dissonant people, painful to travel the road.
So be neither traveler
nor pained.

302

The man of conviction endowed with virtue,
glory, & wealth:
wherever he goes
he is honored.

*303

The good shine from afar

like the snowy Himalayas.
The bad don't appear even when near,
like arrows shot into the night.

304

Sitting alone,
resting alone,
walking alone,
untiring.
Taming himself,
he'd delight alone–
        alone in the forest.

305

Dhp XXII : Hell

He goes to hell,
the one who asserts
what didn't take place,
as does the one
who, having done,
says, 'I didn't.'
Both–low-acting people–
there become equal:
after death, in the world beyond.

306

An ochre robe tied 'round their necks,
many with evil qualities
–unrestrained, evil–
rearise, because of their evil acts,
in hell.

Better to eat an iron ball
–glowing, aflame–
than that, unprincipled &
unrestrained,
you should eat the alms of the country.

307-308

Four things befall the heedless man who lies down with the wife of another:
a wealth of demerit;
a lack of good sleep;
third, censure;
fourth, hell.

A wealth of demerit, an evil destination, & the brief delight of a fearful man with a fearful woman,
& the king inflicts a harsh punishment.
        So
no man should lie down with the wife of another.

309-310

Just as sharp-bladed grass,
if wrongly held,
wounds the very hand that holds it–
the contemplative life, if wrongly grasped, drags you down to hell.

Any slack act,
or defiled observance,
or fraudulent life of chastity bears no great fruit.

If something's to be done,
then work at it firmly,
for a slack going-forth kicks up all the more dust.

It's better to leave a misdeed undone.
A misdeed burns you afterward.
Better that a good deed be done that, after you've done it, won't make you burn.

311-314

Like a frontier fortress, guarded inside & out,
        guard yourself.

Don't let the moment pass by.
Those for whom the moment is past grieve, consigned to hell.

315

Ashamed of what's not shameful, not ashamed of what is,
beings adopting wrong views
go to a bad destination.

Seeing danger where there is none, & no danger where there is,
beings adopting wrong views
go to a bad destination.

Imagining error where there is none, and no error where there is,
beings adopting wrong views
go to a bad destination.

But knowing error as error, and non-error as non-,
beings adopting right views go to a good destination.

316-319

Dhp XXIII : Elephants

I–like an elephant in battle, enduring an arrow shot from a bow– will endure a false accusation, for the mass of people have no principles.

The tamed is the one
they take into assemblies.
The tamed is the one
the king mounts.
The tamed who endures
a false accusation
is, among human beings, the best.

321

Excellent are tamed mules, tamed thoroughbreds,
tamed horses from Sindh.
Excellent, tamed tuskers, great elephants.
But even more excellent are those self-tamed.

For not by these mounts could you go to the land unreached,
as the tamed one goes
by taming, well-taming, himself.

322-323

The tusker, Dhanapalaka, deep in rut, is hard to control.
Bound, he won't eat a morsel:
the tusker misses
the elephant wood.

*324

When torpid & over-fed, a sleepy-head lolling about like a stout hog, fattened on fodder:
a dullard enters the womb over & over again.

325

Before, this mind went wandering however it pleased,
wherever it wanted,
by whatever way that it liked.
Today I will hold it aptly in check– as one wielding a goad, an elephant in rut.

326

Delight in heedfulness.
Watch over your own mind.
Lift yourself up
from the hard-going way, like a tusker sunk in the mud.

327

If you gain a mature companion–
a fellow traveler, right-living, enlightened– overcoming all dangers go with him, gratified,
mindful.

If you don't gain a mature companion–
a fellow traveler, right-living, enlightened–
go alone
like a king renouncing his kingdom,
like the elephant in the Matanga wilds,
his herd.

Going alone is better.
There's no companionship with a fool.
Go alone,
doing no evil, at peace,
like the elephant in the Matanga wilds.

*328-330

A blessing: friends when the need arises.
A blessing: contentment with whatever there is.
Merit at the ending of life is a blessing.
A blessing: the abandoning of all suffering & stress.

A blessing in the world: reverence to your mother.
A blessing: reverence to your father as well.
A blessing in the world: reverence to a contemplative.
A blessing: reverence for a brahman, too.

A blessing into old age is virtue.
A blessing: conviction established.
A blessing: discernment attained.
The non-doing of evil things is a blessing.

331-333

Dhp XXIV : Craving

When a person lives heedlessly,
his craving grows like a creeping vine.
He runs now here
        & now   there,
as if looking for fruit:
        a monkey in the forest.

334

If this sticky, uncouth craving
overcomes you in the world,
your sorrows grow like wild grass
        after rain.

If, in the world, you overcome
this uncouth craving, hard to escape,
sorrows roll off you,
        like water beads off
        a lotus.

335-336

To all of you gathered here
I say: Good fortune.
        Dig up craving
–as when seeking medicinal roots, wild grass–
        by the root.
Don't let Mara cut you down
–as a raging river, a reed–
over & over again.

If its root remains undamaged & strong,
a tree, even if cut,
will grow back.
So too if craving-obsession is not rooted out, this suffering returns
again
&
again.

338

He whose 36 streams, flowing to what is appealing, are strong:
the currents–resolves based on passion– carry him, of base views, away.

They flow every which way, the streams, but the sprouted creeper stays in place.
Now, seeing that the creeper's arisen, cut through its root
with discernment.

*339-340

Loosened & oiled
are the joys of a person.
People, bound by enticement, looking for ease:
to birth & aging they go.

*341

Encircled with craving, people hop round & around
like a rabbit caught in a snare.
Tied with fetters & bonds

they go on to suffering, again & again, for long.

Encircled with craving,
people hop round & around
like a rabbit caught in a snare.
        So a monk
should dispel   craving, should aspire   to dispassion
        for himself.

*342-343

Cleared of the underbrush but obsessed with the forest, set free from the forest,
right back to the forest he runs.
Come, see the person set free who runs right back to the same old chains!

344

That's not a strong bond
–so say the enlightened–
the one made of iron, of wood, or of grass.
To be smitten, enthralled, with jewels & ornaments, longing for children & wives:
that's the strong bond,
–so say the enlightened–
one that's constraining, elastic,
        hard to untie.

But having cut it, they
–the enlightened–go forth, free of longing, abandoning sensual ease.

Those smitten with passion fall back
into a self-made stream, like a spider snared in its web.
But, having cut it, the enlightened set forth,
free of longing, abandoning all suffering & stress.

*345-347

Gone to the beyond of becoming,
you let go of in front,
let go of behind,
let go of between.
With a heart everywhere released, you don't come again to birth & aging.

*348

For a person
forced on by his thinking, fierce in his passion,
focused on beauty,
craving grows all the more.
He's the one
who tightens the bond.

But one who delights
in the stilling of thinking, always
mindful cultivating
a focus on the foul:
He's the one
who will make an end,
the one who will cut Mara's bond.

*349-350

Arrived at the finish, unfrightened, unblemished, free of craving, he has cut away the arrows of becoming.
This physical heap is his last.

Free from craving,
ungrasping,
astute in expression,
knowing the combination of sounds– which comes first & which after.
He's called a last-body greatly discerning great man.

*351-352

All-conquering,
all-knowing am I,
with regard to all things,
        unadhering.
All-abandoning,
released in the ending of craving:
having fully known on my own,
to whom should I point as my teacher?

*353

A gift of Dhamma conquers all gifts;
the taste of Dhamma,
                all tastes;
a delight in Dhamma,
                all delights;
the ending of craving,
                all suffering & stress.

*354

Riches ruin the man
weak in discernment,
but not those who seek the beyond.
Through craving for riches the man weak in discernment ruins himself
as he would others.

355

Fields are spoiled by weeds;
people, by passion.
So what's given to those
free of passion
        bears great fruit.

Fields are spoiled by weeds;
people, by aversion.
So what's given to those
free of aversion
        bears great fruit.

Fields are spoiled by weeds;
people, by delusion.
So what's given to those
free of delusion
        bears great fruit.

Fields are spoiled by weeds;
people, by longing.
So what's given to those
free of longing
        bears great fruit.

356-359

Dhp XXV : Monks

Restraint with the eye is good, good is restraint with the ear.
Restraint with the nose is good,
good is restraint with the tongue.
Restraint with the body is good,
good is restraint with speech.
Restraint with the heart is good,
good is restraint everywhere.
A monk everywhere restrained is released from all suffering & stress.

*360-361

Hands restrained, feet restrained
speech restrained, supremely restrained–
delighting in what is inward, content, centered, alone:
he's what they call
    a monk.

362

A monk restrained in his speaking,
giving counsel unruffled,
declaring the message & meaning:
    sweet is his speech.

*363

Dhamma his dwelling,
Dhamma his delight,

a monk pondering Dhamma,
calling Dhamma to mind,
does not fall away
from true Dhamma.

364

Gains:
don't treat your own with scorn,
don't go coveting those of others.
A monk who covets those of others attains
no concentration.

Even if he gets next to nothing,
he doesn't treat his gains with scorn.
Living purely, untiring:
he's the one
that the devas praise.

365-366

For whom, in name & form
in every way,
there's no sense of mine,
& who doesn't grieve
for what's not:
he's deservedly called
a monk.

367

Dwelling in goodwill, a monk with faith in the Awakened One's teaching,
would attain the good state,
the peaceful state:
stilling-of-fabrications ease.

*368

Monk, bail out this boat.
It will take you lightly when bailed.
Having cut through passion, aversion, you go from there to Unbinding.

*369

Cut through five,
let go of five,
& develop five above all.
A monk gone past five attachments is said to have crossed the flood.

*370

Practice jhana, monk,
and don't be heedless.
Don't take your mind roaming in sensual strands.
Don't swallow–heedless–
the ball of iron aflame.
Don't burn & complain: 'This is pain.'

371

There's
no jhana
for one with
no discernment,
no discernment
for one with
no jhana.
But one with both jhana & discernment:
he's on the verge
of Unbinding.

372

A monk with his mind at peace, going into an empty dwelling, clearly seeing the Dhamma aright:
        his delight is more than human.

However it is,
however it is he touches
the arising-&-passing of aggregates:
he gains rapture & joy:
        that, for those who know it,
                is deathless,
                the Deathless.

373-374

Here the first things for a discerning monk are guarding the senses,
        contentment,
        restraint in line with the Patimokkha.
He should associate with admirable friends.

Living purely, untiring,
        hospitable by habit,
        skilled in his conduct,
        gaining a manifold joy,
he will put an end
to suffering & stress.

375-376

Shed passion & aversion, monks–
as a jasmine would,
its withered flowers.

377

Calmed in body,
calmed in speech,
well-centered & calm,
having disgorged the baits of the world, a monk is called thoroughly
calmed.

378

You yourself
should reprove yourself, should examine yourself.
As a self-guarded monk with guarded self,
mindful, you dwell at ease.

Your own self is
your own mainstay.
Your own self is
your own guide.
Therefore you should watch over yourself–
as a trader, a fine steed.

380

A monk with a manifold joy, with faith in the Awakened One's teaching,
would attain the good state,
the peaceful state:
stilling-of-fabrications ease.

*381

A young monk who strives in the Awakened One's teaching,

brightens the world
like the moon set free from a cloud.

Dhp XXVI : Brahmans

Having striven, brahman, cut the stream.
Expel sensual passions.
Knowing the ending of fabrications, brahman,
you know the Unmade.

*383

When the brahman has gone to the beyond of two things, then all his fetters go to their end– he who knows.

*384

One whose beyond or not-beyond or beyond-&-not-beyond
can't be found;
unshackled, carefree:
he's what I call
a brahman.

*385

Sitting silent, dustless,
absorbed in jhana,
his task done, effluents gone,
ultimate goal attained:
he's what I call
a brahman.

386

By day shines the sun;
by night, the moon;
in armor, the warrior;
in jhana, the brahman.
But all day & all night,
every day & every night,
the Awakened One shines in splendor.

387

He's called a brahman
    for having banished his evil, a contemplative
    for living in consonance, one gone forth
    for having forsaken his own impurities.

*388

One should not strike a brahman, nor should the brahman
let loose with his anger.
Shame on a brahman's killer.
More shame on the brahman whose anger's let loose.

*389

Nothing's better for the brahman than when the mind is held back from what is endearing & not.
However his harmful-heartedness wears away,
that's how stress
simply comes to rest.

*390

Whoever does no wrong
in body,
speech,
heart,
is restrained in these three ways:
he's what I call
a brahman.

391

The person from whom you would learn the Dhamma taught by the Rightly
Self-Awakened One:
you should honor him with respect–
as a brahman, the flame for a sacrifice.

*392

Not by matted hair,
by clan, or by birth,
is one a brahman.
Whoever has truth
& rectitude:
he is a pure one,
he, a brahman.

What's the use of your matted hair,
you dullard?
What's the use of your deerskin cloak?
The tangle's inside you.
You comb the outside.

*393-394

Wearing cast-off rags
–his body lean & lined with veins–

absorbed in jhana,
alone in the forest:
he's what I call
a brahman.

395

I don't call one a brahman
for being born of a mother
or sprung from a womb.
He's called a 'bho-sayer'
if he has anything at all.
But someone with nothing,
who clings to no thing:
he's what I call
a brahman.

*396

Having cut every fetter,
he doesn't get ruffled.
Beyond attachment,
unshackled:
he's what I call
a brahman.

397

Having cut the strap & thong,
cord & bridle,
having thrown off the bar,
awakened:
he's what I call
a brahman.

*398

He endures–unangered–
insult, assault, & imprisonment.

His army is strength;
his strength, forbearance:
he's what I call
a brahman.

399

Free from anger,
duties observed,
principled, with no overbearing pride,
trained, a 'last-body':
he's what I call
a brahman.

*400

Like water on a lotus leaf,
a mustard seed on the tip of an awl,
he doesn't adhere to sensual pleasures:
he's what I call
a brahman.

401

He discerns right here,
for himself,
on his own,
his own
ending of stress.
Unshackled, his burden laid down:
he's what I call
a brahman.

*402

Wise, profound in discernment, astute
as to what is the path & what's not;

his ultimate goal attained:
he's what I call
a brahman.

403

Uncontaminated
by householders
& houseless ones alike;
living with no home,
with next to no wants:
he's what I call
a brahman.

404

Having put aside violence against beings fearful or firm,
he neither kills nor
gets others to kill:
he's what I call
a brahman.

405

Unopposing among opposition,
unbound
among the armed,
unclinging
among those who cling:
he's what I call
a brahman.

406

His passion, aversion,
conceit, & contempt,
have fallen away–
like a mustard seed

from the tip of an awl:
        he's what I call
        a brahman.

407

He would say
what's non-grating,
                instructive,
                true–
abusing no one:
        he's what I call
        a brahman.

408

Here in the world
he takes nothing not-given
–long, short,
        large, small,
                attractive, not:
        he's what I call
        a brahman.

409

His longing for this & for the next world
can't be found;
free from longing, unshackled:
        he's what I call
        a brahman.

410

His attachments,
        his homes,
                can't be found.
He, through knowing,

is unperplexed,
has gained a footing
in the Deathless:
        he's what I call
        a brahman.

*411

He has gone
beyond attachment here
for both merit & evil–
sorrowless, dustless, & pure:
        he's what I call
        a brahman.

*412

Spotless, pure, like the moon
        –limpid & calm–
his delights, his becomings,
                totally gone:
        he's what I call
        a brahman.

413

He has made his way past
this hard-going path
–samsara, delusion–
has crossed over,
has gone beyond,
is free from want,
        from perplexity,
absorbed in jhana,
through no-clinging
Unbound:
        he's what I call
        a brahman.

414

Whoever, abandoning sensual passions here,
would go forth from home–
his sensual passions, becomings,
totally gone:
he's what I call
a brahman.

Whoever, abandoning craving here,
would go forth from home–
his cravings, becomings,
totally gone:
he's what I call
a brahman.

415-416

the human bond,
having made his way past
the divine,
from all bonds unshackled:
he's what I call
a brahman.

delight & displeasure,
cooled, with no acquisitions–
a hero who has conquered
all the world,
every world:
he's what I call
a brahman.

418

He knows in every way
beings' passing away,
and their re-
arising;
unattached, awakened,
well-gone:
        he's what I call
        a brahman.

419

He whose course they don't know
–devas, gandhabbas, & human beings–
his effluents ended, an arahant:
        he's what I call
        a brahman.

420

He who has nothing
–in front, behind, in between–
the one with nothing
who clings to no thing:
        he's what I call
        a brahman.

*421

A splendid bull, conqueror, hero, great seer–
                free from want,
                awakened, washed:
        he's what I call
        a brahman.

422

He knows
                his former lives.

He sees
heavens & states of woe, has attained
the ending of birth,
is a sage
who has mastered full-knowing, his mastery totally mastered:
he's what I call
a brahman.

Historical Notes: The Text & the Translation

There are many versions of the Dhammapada now extant: several recensions of the Pali Dhammapada from Burma, Cambodia, Laos, Sri Lanka, and Thailand; two incomplete manuscripts of a Gandhari Dharmapada found in central Asia; and a manuscript of a Buddhist Hybrid-Sanskrit Dharmapada found in a library in Tibet, called the Patna Dharmapada because photographs of this manuscript are now kept in Patna, India. There is also a Chinese translation of the Dharmapada made in the third century C.E. from a Prakrit original, now no longer extant, similar to–but not identical with–the Pali Dhammapada. Parts of a Dharmapada text are included in the Mahavastu, a text belonging to the Lokottaravadin Mahasanghika school. In addition, there are Sanskrit, Tibetan, and Chinese versions of a text called the Udanavarga, which is known in at least four recensions, all of them containing many verses in common with the Dhammapada/Dharmapada (Dhp) texts. To further complicate matters, there are Jain anthologies that contain verses clearly related to some of those found in these Buddhist anthologies as well.

Despite the many similarities among these texts, they contain enough discrepancies to have fueled a small scholarly industry. The different recensions of the Pali Dhp contain so many variant readings that there isn't yet–even after more than a century of Western scholarship on the topic–a single edition covering them all. The discrepancies among the Pali and non-Pali versions are even greater. They arrange verses in different orders, each contains verses not found in the others, and among the verses in different versions that are related, the similarity in terms of imagery or message is sometimes fairly tenuous.

Fortunately for anyone looking to the Dhp for spiritual guidance, the differences among the various recensions–though many in number–range in importance from fairly minor to minor in the extreme. Allowing for a few obvious scribal errors, none of them fall outside the pale of what has long been accepted as standard early Buddhist doctrine as derived from the Pali discourses. For example, does the milk in verse 71 come out or does it curdle? Is the bond in verse 346 subtle, slack, or elastic? Is the brahman in verse 393 happy or is he pure? For all practical purposes, these questions hardly matter. They become important only when one is forced to take sides in choosing which version to translate, and even then the nature of the choice is like that of a conductor deciding which of the many versions of a Handel oratorio to perform.

Unfortunately for the translator, though, the scholarly discussions that have grown around these issues have tended to blow them all out of proportion, to the point where they call into question the authenticity of the Dhp as a whole. Because the scholars who have devoted themselves to this topic have come up with such contradictory advice for the potential translator–including the suggestion that it's a waste of time to translate some of the verses at all–we need to sort through the discussions to see what, if any, reliable guidance they give.

Those who have worked on the issues raised by the variant versions of Dhp have, by and large, directed the discussion to figuring out which version is the oldest and most authentic, and which versions are later and more corrupt. Lacking any outside landmarks against which the versions can be sighted, scholars have attempted to reconstruct what must have been the earliest version by triangulating among the texts themselves. This textual trigonometry tends to rely on assumptions from among the following three types:

1) Assumptions concerning what is inherently an earlier or later form of a verse. These assumptions are the least reliable of the three, for they involve no truly objective criteria. If, for instance, two versions of a verse differ in that one is more internally consistent than the other, the consistent version will seem more genuine to one scholar, whereas another scholar will attribute the consistency to later efforts to "clean up" the verse. Similarly, if one version contains a rendition of a verse different from all other renditions of the same verse, one scholar will see that as a sign of deviance; another, as a sign of the authenticity that may have predated a later standardization among the texts. Thus the conclusions drawn by different scholars based on these assumptions tell us more about the scholars' presuppositions than they do about the texts themselves.

2) Assumptions concerning the meter of the verses in question. One of the great advances in recent Pali scholarship has been the rediscovery of the metrical rules underlying early Pali poetry. As the Buddha himself is quoted as saying, "Meter is the structural framework of verses." (SN 1:60) Knowledge of metrical rules thus helps the editor or translator spot which readings of a verse deviate from the structure of a standard meter, and which ones follow it. Theoretically, the obvious choice would be to adopt the latter and reject the former. In practice, however, the issue is not so clear-cut. Early Pali poetry dates from a time of great metrical experimentation, and so there is always the possibility that a particular poem was composed in an experimental meter that never achieved widespread recognition. There is also the possibility that–as the poetry was spontaneous and oral–a fair amount of metrical license was allowed. This means that the more "correct" forms of a verse may have been the products of a later attempt to fit the poetry into standard molds. Thus the conclusions based on the assumption of standard meters are not as totally reliable as they might seem.

3) Assumptions concerning the language in which the original Dhp was first composed. These assumptions require an extensive knowledge of Middle Indic dialects. A scholar will assume a particular dialect to have been the original language of the text, and will further make assumptions about the types of translation mistakes that might have been common when translating from that dialect into the languages of the texts we now have. The textual trigonometry based on these assumptions often involves such complicated methods of sighting and computation that it can produce an "original" version of the text that is just that: very original, coinciding with none of the versions extant. In other words, where the current variants of a verse might be a, b, and c, the added assumption about the Dhp's original language and the ineptitude of ancient translators and copyists leads to the conclusion that the verse must have been d. However, for all the impressive erudition that this method involves, not even the most learned scholar can offer any proof as to what the Dhp's original language was. In fact, as we will consider below, it is possible that the Buddha–assuming that he was the author of the verses– composed poetry in more than one language, and more than one version of a particular verse. So, as with the first set of assumptions, the methods of triangulation based on an assumed original language of the Dhp tell us more about the individual scholar's position than they do about the position of the text.

Thus, although the scholarship devoted to the different recensions of the Dhp has provided a useful service in unearthing so many variant readings of the text, none of the assumptions used in trying to sort through those readings for "the original" Dhp have led to any definite conclusions. Their positive success has been limited mainly to offering food for academic speculation and educated guesses.

On the negative side, though, they have succeeded in accomplishing something totally useless: a wholesale sense of distrust for the early Buddhist texts, and the poetic texts in particular. If the texts contain so many varying reports, the feeling goes, and if their translators and transmitters were so incompetent, how can any of them be trusted? This distrust comes from accepting, unconsciously, the assumptions concerning authorship and authenticity within which our modern, predominately literate culture operates: that only one version of a verse could have been composed by its original author, and that all other versions must be later corruptions. In terms of the Dhp, this comes down to assuming that there was only one original version of the text, and that it was composed in a single language.

However, these assumptions are totally inappropriate for analyzing the oral culture in which the Buddha taught and in which the verses of the Dhp were first anthologized. If we look carefully at the nature of that culture–and in particular at clear statements from the early Buddhist texts concerning the events and principles that shaped those texts–we will see that it is perfectly natural that there should be a variety of reports about the Buddha's teachings, all of which might be essentially correct. In terms of the Dhp, we can view the multiple versions of the text as a sign, not of faulty transmission, but of an allegiance to their oral origins.

Oral prose and poetry are very different from their written counterparts. This fact is obvious even in our own culture. However, we have to make an active effort of the imagination to comprehend the expectations placed on oral transmission between speakers and listeners in a culture where there is no written word to fall back on. In such a setting, the verbal heritage is maintained totally through repetition and memorization. A speaker with something new to say has to repeat it often to different audiences–who, if they feel inspired by the message, are expected to memorize at least its essential parts. Because communication is face-to-face, a speaker is particularly prized for an ability to tailor his/her message to the moment of communication, in terms of the audience's background from the past, its state of mind at present, and its hoped-for benefits in the future.

This puts a double imperative on both the speaker and the listener. The speaker must choose his/her words with an eye both to how they will affect the audience in the present and to how they will be memorized for future reference. The listener must be attentive, both to appreciate the immediate impact of the words and to memorize them for future use. Although originality in teaching is appreciated, it is only one of a constellation of virtues expected of a teacher. Other expected virtues include a knowledge of common culture and an ability to play with that knowledge for the desired effect in terms of immediate impact or memorability. The Pali Dhp (verse 45) itself makes this point in comparing the act of teaching, not to creating something totally new out of nothing, but to selecting among available flowers to create a pleasing arrangement just right for the occasion.

Of course, there are situations in an oral culture where either immediate impact or memorability is emphasized at the expense of the other. In a classroom, listening for impact is sacrificed to the needs of listening for memorization, whereas in a theater, the emphasis is reversed. All indications show, however, that the Buddha as a teacher was especially sensitive to both aspects of oral communication, and that he trained his listeners to be sensitive to both as well. On the one hand, the repetitious style of many of his recorded teachings seems to have been aimed at hammering them into the listener's memory; also, at the end of many of his discourses, he would summarize the main points of the discussion in an easy-to-memorize verse.

On the other hand, there are many reports of instances in which his listeners gained immediate Awakening while listening to his words. And, there is a delightful section in one of his discourses (the Samaññaphala Suttanta, DN 2) satirizing the teachers of other religious sects for their inability to break away from the formulaic mode of their teachings to give a direct answer to specific questions ("It's as if, when asked about a mango, one were to answer with a breadfruit," one of the interlocutors comments, "or, when asked about a breadfruit, to answer with a mango.") The Buddha, in contrast, was famous for his ability to speak directly to his listeners' needs.

This sensitivity to both present impact and future use is in line with two well-known Buddhist teachings: first, the basic Buddhist principle of causality, that an act has repercussions both in the present and on into the future; second, the Buddha's realization, early on in his teaching career, that some of his listeners would attain Awakening immediately on hearing his words, whereas others would be able to awaken only after taking his words, contemplating them, and putting them into prolonged practice.

A survey of the Buddha's prose discourses recorded in the Pali Canon gives an idea of how the Buddha met the double demands placed on him as a teacher. In some cases, to respond to a particular situation, he would formulate an entirely original teaching. In others, he would simply repeat a formulaic answer that he kept in store for general use: either teachings original with him, or more traditional teachings–sometimes lightly tailored, sometimes not–that fit in with his message. In still others, he would take formulaic bits and pieces, and combine them in a new way for the needs at hand. A survey of his poetry reveals the same range of material: original works; set pieces–original or borrowed, occasionally altered in line with the occasion; and recyclings of old fragments in new juxtapositions.

Thus, although the Buddha insisted that all his teachings had the same taste–that of release–he taught different variations on the theme of that taste to different people on different occasions, in line with his perception of their short- and long-term needs. In reciting a verse to a particular audience, he might change a word, a line, or an image, to fit in with their backgrounds and individual needs.

Adding to this potential for variety was the fact that the people of northern India in his time spoke a number of different dialects, each with its own traditions of poetry and prose. The Pali Cullavagga (V.33.1) records the Buddha as insisting that his listeners memorize his teachings, not in a standardized lingua franca, but in their own dialects. There is no way of knowing whether he himself was multi-lingual enough to teach all of his students in their own dialects, or expected them to make the translations themselves. Still, it seems likely that, as a well-educated aristocrat of the time, he would have been fluent in at least two or three of the most prevalent dialects. Some of the discourses–such as DN 21–depict the Buddha as an articulate connoisseur of poetry and song, so we can expect that he would also have been sensitive to the special problems involved in the effective translation of poetry–alive, for instance, to the fact that skilled translation requires more than simply substituting equivalent words. The Mahavagga (V.13.9) reports that the Buddha listened, with appreciation, as a monk from the southern country of Avanti recited some of his teachings–apparently in the Avanti dialect–in his presence. Although scholars have often raised questions about which language the Buddha spoke, it might be more appropriate to remain open to the possibility that he spoke–and could compose poetry in–several. This possibility makes the question of "the" original language or "the" original text of the Dhp somewhat irrelevant.

The texts suggest that even during the Buddha's lifetime his students made efforts to collect and memorize a standardized body of his teachings under a rubric of nine categories: dialogues, narratives of mixed prose and verse, explanations, verses, spontaneous exclamations, quotations, birth stories, amazing events, question and answer sessions. However, the act of collecting and memorizing was pursued by only a sub-group among his monks, while other monks, nuns, and lay people doubtlessly had their own individual memorized stores of teachings they had heard directly from the Buddha or indirectly through the reports of their friends and acquaintances.

The Buddha had the foresight to ensure that this less standardized fund of memories not be discounted by later generations; at the same time, he established norms so that mistaken reports, deviating from the principles of his teachings, would not be allowed to creep into the accepted body of doctrine. To discourage fabricated reports of his words, he warned that anyone who put words in his mouth was slandering him (AN 2:23). This, however, could in no way prevent mistaken reports based on honest misunderstandings. So, shortly before his death, he summarized the basic principles of his teachings: the 37 Wings to Awakening (bodhi-pakkhiya dhamma–see the note to verse 301) in the general framework of the development of virtue, concentration, and discernment, leading to release. Then he announced the general norms by which reports of his teachings were to be judged. The Mahaparinibbana Suttanta (DN 16) quotes him as saying:

> "There is the case where a monk says this: 'In the Blessed One's presence have I heard this, in the Blessed One's presence have I received this... In the presence of a community with well-known leading elders... In a monastery with many learned elders who know the tradition... In the presence of a single elder who knows the tradition have I heard this, in his presence have I received this: This is the Dhamma, this is the Vinaya, this is the Teacher's instruction.' His statement is neither to be approved nor scorned. Without approval or scorn, take careful note of his words and make them stand against the discourses and tally them against the Vinaya. If, on making them stand against the discourses and tallying them against the Vinaya, you find that they don't stand with the discourses or tally with the Vinaya, you may conclude: 'This is not the word of the Blessed One; this monk has misunderstood it'–and you should reject it. But if... they stand with the discourses and tally with the Vinaya, you may conclude: 'This is the word of the Blessed One; this monk has understood it rightly.'"

Thus, a report of the Buddha's teachings was to be judged, not on the authority of the reporter or his sources, but on the principle of consistency: did it fit in with what was already known of the doctrine? This principle was designed to ensure that nothing at odds with the original would be accepted into the standard canon, but it did open the possibility that teachings in line with the Buddha's, yet not actually spoken by him, might find their way in. The early redactors of the canon seem to have been alert to this possibility, but not overly worried by it. As the Buddha himself pointed out many times, he did not design or create the Dhamma. He simply found it in nature. Anyone who developed the pitch of mental strengths and abilities needed for Awakening could discover the same principles as well. Thus the Dhamma was by no means exclusively his.

This attitude was carried over into the passages of the Vinaya that cite four categories of Dhamma statements: spoken by the Buddha, spoken by his disciples, spoken by seers (non-Buddhist sages), spoken by heavenly beings. As long as a statement was in accordance with the basic principles, the question of who first stated it did not matter. In an oral culture, where a saying might be associated with a person because he authored it, approved it, repeated it often, or inspired it by his/her words or actions, the question of authorship was not the overriding concern it has since become in literate cultures. The recent discovery of evidence that a number of teachings associated with the Buddha may have pre- or post-dated his time would not have fazed the early Buddhists at all, as long as those teachings were in accordance with the original principles.

Shortly after the Buddha's passing away, the Cullavagga (XI) reports, his disciples met to agree on a standardized canon of his teachings, abandoning the earlier nine-fold classification and organizing the material into something approaching the canon we have today. There is clear evidence that some of the passages in the extant canon do not date to the first convocation, as they report incidents that took place afterwards. The question naturally arises as to whether there are any other later additions not so obvious. This question is particularly relevant with regard to texts like the Dhp, whose organization differs considerably from redaction to redaction, and leads naturally to the further question of whether a later addition to the canon can be considered authentic. The Cullavagga (XI.1.11) recounts an incident that sheds light on this issue:

> Now at that time, Ven. Purana was wandering on a tour of the Southern Hills with a large community of monks, approximately 500 in all. Then, having stayed as long as he liked in the Southern Hills while the elder monks were standardizing the Dhamma and Vinaya, he went to the Bamboo Park, the Squirrels' Sanctuary, in Rajagaha. On arrival, he went to the elder monks and, after > exchanging pleasantries, sat to one side. As he was sitting there, they said to him, "Friend Purana, the Dhamma and Vinaya have been standardized by the elders. Switch over to their standardization." [He replied:] "The Dhamma and Vinaya have been well-standardized by the elders. Still, I will hold simply to what I have heard and received in the Blessed One's presence."

In other words, Ven. Purana maintained–and undoubtedly taught to his followers–a record of the Buddha's teachings that lay outside the standardized version, but was nevertheless authentic. As we have already noted, there were monks, nuns, and lay people like him even while the Buddha was alive, and there were probably others like him who continued maintaining personal memories of the Buddha's teachings even after the latter's death.

This story shows the official early Buddhist attitude toward such differing traditions: each accepted the trustworthiness of the others. As time passed, some of the early communities may have made an effort to include these "external" records in the standardized canon, resulting in various collections of prose and verse passages. The range of these collections would have been determined by the material that was available in, or could be effectively translated into, each individual dialect. Their organization would have depended on the taste and skill of the individual collectors. Thus, for instance, we find verses in the Pali Dhp that do not exist in other Dhps, as well as verses in the Patna and Gandhari Dhps that the Pali tradition assigns to the Jataka or Sutta Nipata. We also find verses in one redaction composed of lines scattered among several verses in another. In any event, the fact that a text was a later addition to the standardized canon does not necessarily mean that it was a later invention. Given the ad hoc way in which the Buddha sometimes taught, and the scattered nature of the communities who memorized his teachings, the later additions to the canons may simply represent earlier traditions that escaped standardization until relatively late.

When Buddhists began committing their canons to writing, approximately at the beginning of the common era, they brought a great change to the dynamic of how their traditions were maintained. The advantages of written over oral transmission are obvious: the texts are saved from the vagaries of human long-term memory and do not die out if those who have memorized them die before teaching others to memorize them as well. The disadvantages of written transmission, however, are less obvious but no less real. Not only is there the possibility of scribal error, but–because transmission is not face-to-face–there can also be the suspicion of scribal error. If a reading seems strange to a student, he has no way of checking with the scribe, perhaps several generations distant, to see if the reading was indeed a mistake. When confronted with such problems, he may "correct" the reading to fit in with his ideas of what must be right, even in cases where the reading was correct, and its perceived strangeness was simply a result of changes in the spoken dialect or of his own limited knowledge and imagination. The fact that manuscripts of other versions of the text were also available for comparison in such instances could have led scribes to homogenize the texts, removing unusual variants even when the variants themselves may have gone back to the earliest days of the tradition.

These considerations of how the Dhp may have been handed down to the present–and especially the possibility that (1) variant recensions might all be authentic, and that (2) agreement among the recensions might be the result of later homogenization–have determined the way in which I have approached this translation of the Pali Dhp. Unlike some other recent translators, I am treating the Pali Dhp as a text with its own integrity–just as each of the alternative traditions has its own integrity–and have not tried to homogenize the various traditions. Where the different Pali recensions are unanimous in their readings, even in cases where the reading seems strange (e.g., 71, 209, 259, 346), I have stuck with the Pali without trying to "rectify" it in light of less unusual readings given in the other traditions. Only in cases where the different Pali redactions are at variance with one another, and the variants seem equally plausible, have I checked the non-Pali texts to see which variant they support. The translation here is drawn from three editions of the text: the Pali Text Society (PTS) edition edited by O. von Hinüber and K.R. Norman (1995); the Oxford edition edited by John Ross Carter and Mahinda Palihawadana, together with its extensive notes (1987); and the Royal Thai edition of the Pali Canon (1982). The pts edition gives the most extensive list of variant readings among the Pali recensions, but even it is not complete. The Royal Thai edition, for example, contains 49 preferred and 8 variant readings not given in the PTS version at all. Passages where I have differed from the PTS reading are cited in the End Notes.

Drawing selectively on various recensions in this way, I cannot guarantee that the resulting reading of the Dhp corresponds exactly to the Buddha's words, or to any one text that once existed in ancient India. However, as I mentioned at the beginning of this note, all the recensions agree in their basic principles, so the question is immaterial. The true test of the reading–and the resulting translation–is if the reader feels engaged enough by the verses to put their principles into practice and finds that they do indeed lead to the release that the Buddha taught. In the final analysis, nothing else really counts.

End Notes

(Numbers refer and link to verses)

1-2: The fact that the word mano is paired here with dhamma would seem to suggest that it is meant in its role as "intellect," the sense medium that conveys knowledge of ideas or mental objects (two possible meanings for the word "dhamma"). However, the illustrations in the second sentence of each verse show that it is actually meant in its role as the mental factor responsible for the quality of one's actions (as in mano-kamma), the factor of will and intention, shaping not only mental events but also physical reality (on this point, see SN 35:145). Thus, following a Thai tradition, I have rendered it here as "heart."

The images in these verses are carefully chosen. The cart, representing suffering, is a burden on the ox pulling it, and the weight of its wheels obliterates the ox's track. The shadow, representing happiness, is no weight on the body at all.

All Pali recensions of this verse give the reading, manomaya = made of the heart, while all other recensions give the reading manojava = impelled by the heart.

7-8: Focused on the foul: A meditative exercise in focusing on the foul aspects of the body so as to help undercut lust and attachment for the body (see MN 119). AN 3:16 gives a standard definition for restraint with the senses: "And how does a monk guard the doors to his sense faculties? There is the case where a monk, on seeing a form with the eye, does not grasp at any theme or particulars by which–if he were to dwell without restraint over the faculty of the eye–evil, unskillful qualities such as greed or distress might assail him. He practices with restraint. He guards the faculty of the eye. He achieves restraint with regard to the faculty of the eye. (Similarly with the ear, nose, tongue, body & intellect.) This is how a monk guards the doors to his sense faculties."

11-12: Wrong resolves = mental resolves for sensuality, ill will, or harmfulness. Right resolves = mental resolves for freedom from sensuality, for freedom from ill will, and for harmlessness.

17-18: "Destination" in these two verses and throughout the text means one's destination after death.

21: The Deathless = Unbinding (nibbana/nirvana), which gives release from the cycle of death and rebirth.

22: "The range of the noble ones": Any of the four stages of Awakening, as well as the total Unbinding to which they lead. The four stages are: (1) stream-entry, at which one abandons the first three mental fetters tying one to the round of rebirth: self-identity views, uncertainty, and grasping at habits and practices; (2) once-returning, at which passion, aversion, and delusion are further weakened; (3) non-returning, at which sensual passion and irritation are abandoned; and (4) arahantship, at which the final five fetters are abandoned: passion for form, passion for formless phenomena, conceit, restlessness, and ignorance. For other references to the "range of the noble ones," see 92-93 and 179-180.

37: "Lying in a cave": According to the Dhp Commentary (hereafter referred to as DhpA), "cave" here means the physical heart, as well as the four great properties–earth (solidity), water (liquidity), fire (heat), and wind (motion)–that make up the body. Sn 4:2 also compares the body to a cave.

39: According to DhpA, "unsoddened mind" means one into which the rain of passion doesn't penetrate (see 13-14); "unassaulted awareness" means a mind not assaulted by anger. "Beyond merit & evil": The arahant is beyond merit and evil in that he/she has none of the mental defilements–passion, aversion, or delusion–that would lead to evil actions, and none of the attachments that would cause his/her actions to bear kammic fruit of any sort, good or bad.

40: "Without settling there, without laying claim": two meanings of the word anivesano.

42: AN 7:60 illustrates this point with seven ways that a person harms him/herself when angry, bringing on results that an enemy would wish: He/she becomes ugly, sleeps badly, mistakes profit for loss and loss for profit, loses wealth, loses his/her reputation, loses friends, and acts in such a way that–after death–he/she reappears in a bad rebirth.

44-45: "Dhamma-saying": This is a translation for the term dhammapada. To ferret out the well-taught Dhamma-saying means to select the appropriate maxim to apply to a particular situation, in the same way that a flower-arranger chooses the right flower, from a heap of available flowers (see 53), to fit into a particular spot in the arrangement. "The learner-on-the-path": A person who has attained any of the first three of the four stages of Awakening (see note 22).

48: According to DhpA, the End-maker is death. According to another ancient commentary, the End-maker is Mara.

53: The last line of the Pali here can be read in two ways, either "even so, many a skillful thing should be done by one born & mortal" or "even so, many a skillful thing should be done with what's born & mortal." The first reading takes the phrase jatena maccena, born & mortal, as being analogous to the flower-arranger implicit in the image. The second takes it as analogous to the heap of flowers explicitly mentioned. In this sense, "what's born & is mortal" would denote one's body, wealth, and talents.

54-56: Tagara = a shrub that, in powdered form, is used as a perfume. AN 3:79 explains the how the scent of a virtuous person goes against the wind and wafts to the devas, by saying that those human and celestial beings who know of the good character of a virtuous person will broadcast one's good name in all directions.

57: "Right knowing": the knowledge of full Awakening.

71: "Doesn't–like ready milk–come out right away": All Pali recensions of this verse give the verb muccati–"to come out" or "to be released"–whereas DhpA agrees with the Sanskrit recensions in reading the verb as if it were mucchati/murchati, "to curdle." The former reading makes more sense, both in terms of the image of the poem–which contrasts coming out with staying hidden–and with the plain fact that fresh milk doesn't curdle right away. The Chinese translation of Dhp supports this reading, as do two of three scholarly editions of the Patna Dhp.

79: "Drinking the Dhamma, refreshed by the Dhamma": two meanings of the word, dhammapiti. "Clear … calm": two meanings of vipasannena.

83: "Stand apart": reading cajanti with DhpA and many Asian editions.

86: The syntax of this verse yields the best sense if we take param as meaning "across," and not as "the far shore."

89: Factors for self-awakening = mindfulness, analysis of qualities, persistence, rapture, serenity, concentration, and equanimity.

92-93: "Having understood food …. independent of nutriment": The first question in the Novice's Questions (Khp 4) is "What is one?" The answer: "All animals subsist on nutriment." The concept of food and nutriment here refers to the most basic way of understanding the causal principle that plays such a central role in the Buddha's teaching. As SN 12:64 points out, "There are these four nutriments for the establishing of beings who have taken birth or for the support of those in search of a place to be born. Which four? Physical nutriment, gross or refined; contact as the second, consciousness the third, and intellectual intention the fourth." The present verses make the point that the arahant has so fully understood the process of physical and mental causality that he/she is totally independent of it, and thus will never take birth again. Such a person cannot be comprehended by any of the forms of understanding that operate within the causal realm.

94: "Such (tadin)": an adjective used to describe one who has attained the goal of Buddhist practice, indicating that the person's state is indefinable but not subject to change or influences of any sort. "Right knowing": the knowledge of full Awakening.

95: Indra's pillar = a post set up at the gate of a city. According to DhpA, there was an ancient custom of worshipping this post with flowers and offerings, although those who wanted to show their disrespect for this custom would urinate and defecate on the post. In either case, the post did not react.

97: This verse is a series of puns. The negative meanings of the puns are on the left side of the slashes; the positive meanings, on the right. The negative meanings are so extremely negative that they were probably intended to shock their listeners. One scholar has suggested that the last word–uttamaporiso, the ultimate person–should also be read as a pun, with the negative meaning, "the extreme of audacity," but that would weaken the shock value of the verse.

100: According to DhpA, the word sahassam in this and the following verses means "by the thousands" rather than "a thousand." The same principle would also seem to hold for satam–"by the hundreds" rather than "a hundred"–in 102.

108: "Doesn't come to a fourth": DhpA: The merit produced by all sacrificial offerings given in the world in the course of a year doesn't equal even one fourth of the merit made by paying homage once to one who has gone the straight way to Unbinding.

121-122: "('It won't amount to much')": reading na mattam agamissati with the Thai edition. Other editions read, na mantam agamissati, "It won't come to me."

126: Heaven and hell, in the Buddhist view of the cosmos, are not eternal states. One may be reborn on one of the various levels of heaven or hell as the result of one's kamma on the human plane, and then leave that level when that particular store of kamma wears out.

143: Some translators have proposed that the verb apabodheti, here translated as "awakens" should be changed to appam bodheti, "to think little of." This, however, goes against the sense of the verse and of a recurrent image in the Canon, that the better-bred the horse, the more sensitive it is even to the idea of the whip, to say nothing of the whip itself. See, for example, AN 4:113.

The question raised in this verse is answered in SN 1:18:

> Those restrained by conscience > are rare–
> those who go through life > always mindful.
> Having reached the end
> of suffering & stress, > they go through what is uneven > evenly;
> go through what is out-of-tune > in tune.

152: Muscles: This is a translation of the Pali mansani, which is usually rendered in this verse as "flesh." However, because the Pali word is in the plural form, "muscles" seems more accurate–and more to the point.

153-154: DhpA: These verses were the Buddha's first utterance after his full Awakening. For some reason, they are not reported in any of the other canonical accounts of the events following on the Awakening.

DhpA: "House" = selfhood; house-builder = craving. "House" may also refer to the nine abodes of beings–the seven stations of consciousness and two spheres (see Khp 4 and DN 15).

The word anibbisam in 153 can be read either as the negative gerund of nibbisati ("earning, gaining a reward") or as the negative gerund of nivisati, altered to fit the meter, meaning "coming to a rest, settled, situated." Both readings make sense in the context of the verse, so the word is probably intended to have a double meaning: without reward, without rest.

157: "The three watches of the night": this is the literal meaning of the verse, but DhpA shows that the image of staying up to nurse someone in the night is meant to stand for being wakeful and attentive throughout the three stages of life: youth, middle age, and old age. The point here is that it is never too early or too late to wake up and begin nurturing the good qualities of mind that will lead to one's true benefit. On this point, see AN 3:51-52, where the Buddha counsels two old brahmans, nearing the end of their life span, to begin practicing generosity along with restraint in thought, word, and deed.

162: DhpA completes the image of the poem by saying that one's vice brings about one's own downfall, just as a maluva creeper ultimately brings about the downfall of the tree it overspreads. See note 42.

164: A bamboo plant bears fruit only once and then dies soon after.

165: "No one purifies another. No other purifies one." These are the two meanings of the one phrase, naññ̃o aññ̃am visodhaye.

166: AN 4:95 lists four types of people in descending order: those devoted to their own true welfare as well as that of others, those devoted to their own true welfare but not that of others, those devoted to the true welfare of others but not their own, and those devoted neither to their own true welfare nor that of others. SN 47:19 makes the point that if one is truly devoted to one's own welfare, others automatically benefit, in the same way that an acrobat maintaining his/her own balance helps his/her partner stay balanced as well.

170: Sn 5:15 reports a conversation between the Buddha and the brahman Mogharaja with a point similar to that of this verse:

> Mogharaja:
> How does one view the world
> so as not to be seen
> by Death's king?
>
> The Buddha:
> View the world, Mogharaja, > as empty–
> always mindful
> to have removed any view > about self.
> This way one is above & beyond death.
> This is how one views the world
> so as not to be seen
> by Death's king.

176: This verse is also found at Iti 25, where the context makes clear the meaning of ekam dhammam, or "this one thing": the principle of truthfulness.

178: The fruit of stream entry is the first of the four stages of Awakening (see note 22). A person who has attained stream entry–entry into the stream that flows inevitably to Unbinding–is destined to attain full Awakening within at most seven lifetimes, never falling below the human state in the interim.

183-185: These verses are a summary of a talk called the Ovada Patimokkha, which the Buddha is said to have delivered to an assembly of 1,250 arahants in the first year after his Awakening. Verse 183 is traditionally viewed as expressing the heart of the Buddha's teachings.

195-196: Objectification = papañca. Alternative translations of this term would be proliferation, elaboration, exaggeration, complication. The term is used both in philosophical contexts–in connection with troubles and conflict–and in artistic contexts, in connection with the way in which an artistic theme is objectified and elaborated. Sn 4:14 states that the classifications of objectification begin with the perception by which one objectifies oneself–"I am thinker"–and then spread to objectify the rest of experience around the issues caused by that perception. MN 18 explains how this leads to conflict: "Dependent on eye & forms, eye-consciousness arises. The meeting of the three is contact. With contact as a requisite condition, there is feeling. What one feels, one perceives [labels in the mind]. What one perceives, one thinks about. What one thinks about, one objectifies. Based on what a person objectifies, the perceptions & categories of objectification assail him/her with regard to past, present, & future forms cognizable via the eye. [Similarly with the other senses.] …. Now, with regard to the cause whereby the perceptions & categories of objectification assail a person: if there is nothing there to relish, welcome, or remain fastened to, then that is the end of obsession with passion, irritation, views, uncertainty, conceit, passion for becoming, & ignorance. That is the end of taking up rods & bladed weapons, of arguments, quarrels, disputes, accusations, divisive tale-bearing, & false speech. That is where these evil, unskillful actions cease without remainder."

209: This verse plays with the various meanings of yoga (task, striving, application, meditation) and a related term, anuyuñjati (keeping after something, taking someone to task). In place of the Pali reading attanuyoginam, "those who kept after themselves," the Patna Dhp reads atthanuyoginam, "those who kept after/remained devoted to the goal."

218: "The up-flowing stream": DhpA: the attainment of non-returning, the third of the four stages of Awakening (see note 22).

219-220: The Pali in these verses repeats the word "comes" three times, to emphasize the idea that if the results of meritorious actions await one after death, one's going to the next world is more like a homecoming.

231-233: Bodily misconduct = killing, stealing, engaging in illicit sex. Verbal misconduct = lies, divisive speech, harsh speech, idle chatter. Mental misconduct = covetousness, ill will, wrong views.

235: Yama = the god of the underworld. Yama's minions or underlings were believed to appear to a person just prior to the moment of death.

236: Impurities, blemishes = passion, aversion, delusion, and their various permutations, including envy, miserliness, hypocrisy, and boastfulness.

240: "One who lives slovenly": As DhpA makes clear, this refers to one who uses the requisites of food, clothing, shelter, and medicine without the wisdom that comes with reflecting on their proper use. The Pali term here is atidhonacarin, a compound built around the word dhona, which means clean or pure. The ati- in the compound could mean "overly," thus yielding, "one overly scrupulous in his behavior," but it can also mean "transgressing," thus, "transgressing against what is clean" = "slovenly." The latter reading fits better with the image of rust as a deficiency in the iron resulting from carelessness.

254-255: "No outside contemplative": No true contemplative, defined as a person who has attained any of the four stages of Awakening, exists outside of the practice of the Buddha's teachings (see note 22). In DN 16, the Buddha is quoted as teaching his final student: "In any doctrine & discipline where the noble eightfold path is not found, no contemplative of the first… second… third… fourth order [stream-winner, once-returner, non-returner, or arahant] is found. But in any doctrine & discipline where the noble eightfold path is found, contemplatives of the first… second… third… fourth order are found. The noble eightfold path is found in this doctrine & discipline, and right here there are contemplatives of the first… second… third… fourth order. Other teachings are empty of knowledgeable contemplatives. And if the monks dwell rightly, this world will not be empty of arahants." (On the noble eightfold path, see note 191.)

On "objectification," see note 195-196.

256-257: The sense of the verse, confirmed by DhpA, suggests that the Pali word dhammattho means "judge." This, in fact, is the theme tying together the verses in this chapter. The duty of a judge is to correctly determine attha, a word that denotes both "meaning" and "judgment," these two senses of the word being connected by the fact that the judge must interpret the meanings of words used in rules and principles to see how they correctly apply to the particulars of a case so that he can pass a correct verdict. The remaining verses in this chapter give examples of interpreting attha in an appropriate way.

259: "Sees Dhamma through his body": The more common expression in the Pali Canon (e.g., in AN 6:46 and AN 9:45) is to touch Dhamma through or with the body (phusati or phassati, "he touches," rather than passati, "he sees"). The Sanskrit recensions and the Patna Dhp all support the reading, "he would touch," but all Pali recensions are unanimous in the reading, "he sees." Some scholars regard this latter reading as a corruption of the verse; I personally find it a more striking image than the common expression.

265: This verse plays with a number of nouns and verbs related to the adjective sama, which means "even," "equal," "on pitch," or "in tune." Throughout ancient cultures, the terminology of music was used to describe the moral quality of people and acts. Discordant intervals or poorly-tuned musical instruments were metaphors for evil; harmonious intervals and well-tuned instruments, for good. Thus in Pali, samana, or contemplative, also means a person who is in tune with the principles of rightness and truth inherent in nature. Here and in 388, I've attempted to give a hint of these implications by associating the word "contemplative" with "consonance."

268-269: This verse contains the Buddhist refutation of the idea that "those who know don't speak, those who speak don't know." For another refutation of the same idea, see DN 12. In Vedic times, a sage (muni) was a person who took a vow of silence (mona) and was supposed to gain special knowledge as a result. The Buddhists adopted the term muni, but redefined it to show how true knowledge was attained and how it expressed itself in the sage's actions. For a fuller portrait of the ideal Buddhist sage, see AN 3:23 and Sn 1:12.

271-272: This verse has what seems to be a rare construction, in which na + instrumental nouns + a verb in the aorist tense gives the force of a prohibitive ("Don't, on account of x, do y"). "The renunciate ease that run-of-the-mill people don't know," according to DhpA, is the state of non-returning, the third of the four stages of Awakening (see note 22). Because non-returners are still attached to subtle states of becoming on the level of form and formlessness, DhpA drives home the message that even non-returners should not be complacent by paraphrasing a passage from AN 1:329 (202 in the Thai edition; at the end of Chapter 19 in the PTS edition) that reads, "Just as even a small amount of excrement is foul-smelling, in the same way I do not praise even a small amount of becoming, even for the extent of a fingersnap."

273: The four truths: stress, its cause, its cessation, and the path to its cessation (which is identical to the eightfold path). See note 191.

275: "I have taught you this path": reading akkhato vo maya maggo with the Thai edition, a reading supported by the Patna Dhp. "Having known–for your knowing": two ways of interpreting what is apparently a play on the Pali word, aññaya, which can be either be the gerund of ajanati or the dative of aññā. On the extraction of arrows as a metaphor for the practice, see MN 63 and MN 105.

285: Although the first word in this verse, ucchinda, literally means "crush," "destroy," "annihilate," I have found no previous English translation that renders it accordingly. Most translate it as "cut out" or "uproot," which weakens the image. On the role played by self-allure in leading the heart to become fixated on others, see AN 7:48.

288: Ender = death.

293: Mindfulness immersed in the body = the practice of focusing on the body at all times simply as a phenomenon in & of itself, as a way of developing meditative absorption (jhana) and removing any sense of attraction to, distress over, or identification with the body. MN 119 lists the following practices as instances of mindfulness immersed in the body: mindfulness of breathing, awareness of the four postures of the body (standing, sitting, walking, lying down), alertness to all the actions of the body, analysis of the body into its 32 parts, analysis of it into its four properties (earth, water, fire, wind), and contemplation of the body's inevitable decomposition after death.

294: This verse and the one following it use terms with ambiguous meanings to shock the listener. According to DhpA, mother = craving; father = conceit; two warrior kings = views of eternalism (that one has an identity remaining constant through all time) and of annihilationism (that one is totally annihilated at death); kingdom = the twelve sense spheres (the senses of sight, hearing, smell, taste, feeling, and ideation, together with their respective objects); dependency = passions for the sense spheres.

295: DhpA: two learned kings = views of eternalism and annihilationism; a tiger = the path where the tiger goes for food, i.e., the hindrance of uncertainty, or else all five hindrances (sensual desire, ill will, torpor & lethargy, restlessness & anxiety, and uncertainty). However, in Sanskrit literature, "tiger" is a term for a powerful and eminent man; if that is what is meant here, the term may stand for anger.

299: See note 293.

301: "Developing the mind" in terms of the 37 Wings to Awakening: the four frames of reference (ardent, mindful alertness to body, feelings, mind states, and mental qualities in & of themselves), the four right exertions (to abandon and avoid evil, unskillful mental qualities, and to foster and strengthen skillful mental qualities), the four bases of power (concentration based on desire, persistence, intentness, and discrimination), the five strengths and five faculties (conviction, persistence, mindfulness, concentration, and discernment), the seven factors for self-awakening (see note 89), and the noble eightfold path (see note 191). For a full treatment of this topic, see The Wings to Awakening (DhammaDana Publications, 1996).

303: DhpA: Wealth = both material wealth and the seven forms of noble wealth (ariya-dhana): conviction, virtue, shame, compunction (at the thought of doing evil), erudition, generosity, discernment.

324: DhpA: Dhanapalaka was a noble elephant captured for the king of Kasi. Although given palatial quarters with the finest food, he showed no interest, but thought only of the sorrow his mother felt, alone in the elephant wood, separated from her son.

329-330: DhpA: The bull elephant named Matanga, reflecting on the inconveniences of living in a herd crowded with she-elephants and young elephants–he was pushed around as he went into the river, had to drink muddied water, had to eat leaves that others had already nibbled, etc.–decided that he would find more pleasure in living alone. His story parallels that of the elephant in AN 9:40 and elephant the Buddha met in the Parileyyaka Forest (Mv.X.4.6-7).

337: This verse provides a Buddhist twist to the typical benedictions found in works of kavya. Instead of expressing a wish that the listeners meet with wealth, fame, status, or other worldly forms of good fortune, it describes the highest good fortune, which can be accomplished only through one's own skillful kamma: the uprooting of craving and the resulting state of total freedom from the round of death and rebirth. A similar twist on the theme of good fortune is found in the Mangala Sutta (Khp 5, Sn 2:4), which teaches that the best protective charm is to develop skillful kamma, ultimately developing the mind to the point where it is untouched by the vagaries of the world.

339: 36 streams = three forms of desire for each of the internal and external sense spheres (see note 294)–3 x 2 x 6 = 36. According to one sub-commentary, the three forms of desire are desires focused on the past, present, and future. According to another, they are craving for sensuality, for becoming, and for non-becoming.

340: "Every which way": Reading sabbadhi with the Thai and Burmese editions. The creeper, according to DhpA, is craving, which sends thoughts out to wrap around its objects, while it itself stays rooted in the mind.

341: This verse contains an implied simile: the terms "loosened & oiled," here applied to joys, were commonly used to describe smooth bowel movements.

343: For the various meanings that attano–"for himself"–can have in this verse, see note 402.

346: "Elastic": The usual translation for sithilam–"slack"–does not fit in this verse, but all the Pali recensions are unanimous on this reading, so I have chosen a near synonym that does. The Patna Dhp renders this term as "subtle," whereas the Tibetan commentary to the Udanavarga explains the line as a whole as meaning "hard for the slack to untie." Both alternatives make sense, but may be attempts to "correct" a term that could well have originally meant "elastic," a meaning that got lost with the passage of time.

348: DhpA: In front = the aggregates of the past; behind = the aggregates of the future; in between = the aggregates of the present. see also note 385.

350: "A focus on the foul": A meditative exercise in focusing on the foul parts of the body so as to help undercut lust and attachment for the body. See note 7-8.

352: "Astute in expression, knowing the combination of sounds–which comes first & which after": Some arahants, in addition to their ability to overcome all of their defilements, are also endowed with four forms of acumen (patisambhida), one of which is acumen with regard to expression (nirutti-patisambhida), i.e., a total mastery of linguistic expression. This talent in particular must have been of interest to the anthologist(s) who put together the Dhp.

"Last-body": Because an arahant will not be reborn, this present body is his/her last.

353: According to MN 26 and Mv.I.6.7, one of the first people the Buddha met after his Awakening was an ascetic who commented on the clarity of his faculties and asked who his teacher was. This verse was part of the Buddha's response.

354: This verse contains several terms related to aesthetics. Both dhamma (justice) and dana (gift/generosity) are sub-types of the heroic rasa, or savor. (See the Introduction.) The third sub-type of the heroic–yuddha (warfare)–is suggested by the verb "conquer," which occurs four times in the Pali. Rati (delight/love) is the emotion (bhava) that corresponds to the sensitive rasa. In effect, the verse is saying that the highest forms of rasa and emotion are those related to Dhamma; the highest expression of the heroic Dhamma rasa is in the ending of craving.

360-361: See note 7-8.

363: "Counsel": In the context of Indian literary theory, this is the meaning of the word manta, which can also mean "chant." The literary context seems to be the proper one here.

368: "Stilling-of-fabrications ease": the true ease and freedom experienced when all five aggregates are stilled.

369: DhpA: The boat = one's own personhood (atta-bhava, the body-mind complex); the water that needs to be bailed out = wrong thoughts (imbued with passion, aversion, or delusion).

370: DhpA: Cut through five = the five lower fetters that tie the mind to the round of rebirth (self-identity views, uncertainty, grasping at habits & practices, sensual passion, irritation); let go of five = the five higher fetters (passion for form, passion for formless phenomena, conceit, restlessness, ignorance); develop five = the five faculties (conviction, persistence, mindfulness, concentration, discernment); five attachments = passion, aversion, delusion, conceit, views.

381: See note 368.

383: This verse, addressed to a member of the brahman caste, is one of the few in Dhp where the word brahman is used in its ordinary sense, as indicating caste membership, and not in its special Buddhist sense as indicating an arahant.

384: DhpA: two things = tranquility meditation and insight meditation.

385: DhpA: This verse refers to a person who has no sense of "I" or "mine," either for the senses ("not-beyond") or their objects ("beyond"). The passage may also refer to the sense of total limitlessness that makes the experience of Unbinding totally ineffable, as reflected in the following conversation (Sn 5:6):

Upasiva:
He who has reached the end:
Does he not exist,
or is he for eternity free from dis-ease?
Please, sage, declare this to me
as this phenomenon has been known by you.

The Buddha:
One who has reached the end has no criterion by which anyone would say that– it doesn't exist for him.
When all phenomena are done away with,
all means of speaking are done away with as well.

388: Stains = the impurities listed in note 236. On "consonance," see note 265.

389: The word "anger" here is added from DhpA, which interprets the "letting loose" as the act of retaliating with anger against one's assailant. Some translators read "brahman" as the subject not only of the second line, but also the first: "A brahman should/would not strike a brahman." However, this reading is unlikely, for a brahman (in this context, an arahant) would not strike anyone at all. If a brahman retaliates with anger to being struck, that is a sign that he is not a true brahman: thus more shame on him for having assumed a status not truly his. On the topic of how to react to violent attack, see MN 21 and MN 145.

390: "What's endearing & not": In the phrase manaso piyehi, piyehi can be read straight as it is, as "endearing," or as an elided form of apiyehi, "not endearing." The former reading is more straightforward, but given the reference to "harmful-heartedness" in the next line, the latter reading serves to tie the stanza together. It is also consistent with the fact that DhpA takes this verse to be a continuation of 389. Given the way in which kavya cultivated a taste for ambiguities and multiple interpretations, both readings may have been intended.

392: "Brahman" here is used in its ordinary sense, as indicating caste membership, and not in its special Buddhist sense as indicating an arahant.

393: "He is a pure one": reading so suci with the Thai edition, a reading supported by the Chinese translation of the Dhp.

394: In India of the Buddha's day, matted hair, etc., were regarded as visible signs of spiritual status.

396: "Bho-sayer"–Brahmans addressed others as "bho" as a way of indicating their (the brahmans') superior caste. "If he has anything" (reading sa ce with the Burmese edition) = if he/she lays claim to anything as his/her own.

398: DhpA: strap = resentment; thong = craving; cord = 62 forms of wrong view (listed in the Brahmajala Suttanta, DN 1); bridle = obsessions (sensuality, becoming, anger, conceit, views, uncertainty, ignorance).

400: "With no overbearing pride": reading anussadam with the Thai and Burmese editions. "Last-body": see note 352.

402: "For himself, on his own, his own ending of stress": three different ways that the one word attano functions in this verse.

411: According to DhpA, "attachments/homes (alaya)" = cravings. "Knowing": the knowledge of full Awakening (aññā). "He has gained a footing": The image here derives from a standard analogy comparing the practice to the act of crossing a river. According to AN 7:15, the point where the meditator gains footing on the river bottom, but before getting up on the bank, corresponds to the third stage of awakening, the attainment of non-return. To reach the fourth stage, becoming an arahant, is to go beyond the river and stand on firm ground.

412: See note 39.

421: See note 348.

423: The forms of mastery listed in this verse correspond to the three knowledges that comprised the Buddha's Awakening: knowledge of previous lives, knowledge of how beings pass away and are reborn in the various levels of being, and knowledge of the ending of the effluents that maintain the process of birth.

More than a decade ago I began supplying translations from the Pali Canon to what was then a fledgling website, Access to Insight. Among the earliest translations was an anthology of passages from the Udāna. For quite some time now I have wanted to replace that anthology with a complete translation, both because my early effort contained a number of minor mistakes, and because, as I became more sensitive to the literary dimensions of the Pali Canon, I came to see that the Udāna is a well-constructed whole, with each part amplifying and amplified by the others. Only a complete translation could do justice to the skill with which the collection was compiled.

In October of last year I had the opportunity to revisit the text and to begin work on a complete, more correct translation. With the benefit of computerized versions of the Pali Canon now available, I was able not only to compare various editions of the text, but also to explore more fully other udānas and udāna-like passages in the Pali Canon. Also, I made a more thorough study of the text and the values it expresses, creating the tables used in the Introduction. And I tried to place the text in the context of Indian literary theory, to help get a better sense of the effect at which the compilers may have been aiming.

At the same time, because of the recent surge of interest in approaching early Buddhist texts from modern and post-modern perspectives, I felt that it would be worthwhile to consider how beneficial these approaches might be with this particular text. These considerations made their way into the Introduction as well. I hope you find them useful.

Just as I was completing the manuscript, I became aware of two works by Ven. Ānandajoti in this area: a complete translation of the Udāna and a comparative study of parallels to the Udāna verses in the Udānavarga, a text composed in the language called Buddhist Hybrid Sanskrit. Comparing my work with his, I was able to ferret out a few more errors in my translation and to incorporate the results of some of his research into my notes. Thus I am in his debt. However, because the aims and method of his translation differed from mine, I feel that this new translation is not superfluous.

The primary foundation for this translation is the Thai edition of the Pali text, printed by Mahāmakut Rājavidyālaya, Bangkok, 1981. I have also consulted Sri Lankan and Burmese editions available online through the Journal of Buddhist Ethics and the Digital Pali Reader. All of these texts have their flaws, so I have had to make choices among them. In cases where the Thai text contained readings that were obviously wrong, I have chosen readings from one or both of the other sources. In cases where none of the variant readings in the different editions seemed obviously better than the others, I have stuck with the Thai reading even when the other editions were seconded by the Udānavarga. This is because there already exist English translations based on the Sri Lankan and Burmese editions; I felt that the Thai edition should have its chance to speak to the larger world.

Many people have reviewed the manuscript and made valuable suggestions for improvement. In addition to the monks here at the monastery, this includes Michael Barber, Charles Malloy IV, Addie Onsanit, Nathaniel Osgood, Mary Talbot, and Barbara Wright. Any errors that remain in the manuscript, of course, are my own.

Introduction

Meaning in the Udāna

The term udāna has two meanings, one denoting a vocal expression, the other a genre of text. As a vocal expression, it can be translated roughly as "exclamation," and in particular an exclamation that's spontaneous and inspired. As a genre of text, udāna means a style of narrative that developed in an effort to commit to memory the Buddha's inspired exclamations, along with brief accounts of the events that inspired them.

Several passages in the Pali Canon (such as AN 7:64 and MN 22) depict the Buddha as mentioning nine genres in which his teachings and events in his life were memorized during his lifetime, udānas being among them. Cullavagga XI reports that, shortly after the Buddha's passing away, a large council of his disciples met to agree on a standardized form in which to remember his teachings, beginning a process that led to the Pali Canon we have today. At present, the Khuddaka Nikāya (Short Collection) contains as its third text a collection of eighty udānas called, simply, Udāna. (To distinguish between individual udānas and the collection as a whole, the standard practice is to capitalize the latter and not the former.) Scholars have questioned whether this collection is related to the udānas collected during the Buddha's lifetime–for a few observations on this question, see Appendix One–but there are no compelling reasons to believe that the relationship is not close. That is why I felt that a complete translation of the Udāna we currently have would be worthwhile.

The role of the Udāna within the context of the Pali Canon is to focus on the values and principles–"meaning" in the larger sense of the term–that underlie the Buddha's teachings. This point can be seen clearly in how each udāna is organized. It begins with a narrative of an event or series of events, followed (with a few variations) by the formula: "Then, on realizing the significance/meaning (attha) of that, the Blessed One on that occasion exclaimed." This, in turn, is followed by a spontaneous exclamation–a poem, a passage of prose, or a combination of the two–in which the Buddha expresses what that meaning or significance is.

To understand the purpose of this way of structuring each udāna, we can compare it to the itivuttakas ("quotations"), which resemble the udānas in three ways: They are listed among the original nine genres of Buddhist texts; they currently exist as a book in the Khuddaka Nikāya (the fourth, immediately after the Udāna); and each consists of a prose passage followed by a poem. The itivuttakas differ from the udānas in that the prose passage is a summary of a Dhamma talk, and the concluding poem further distills the basic points of the talk into an easy-to-memorize form. Thus the closing passages in an itivuttaka are meant primarily as memory aids.

In an udāna, however, the closing exclamations are aimed more at understanding the significance of what can be learned from an event. Although some of these exclamations give recommendations on what to do in response to an event of that particular sort–such as how to deal with unfair criticism–most of them express and extol more general values in their praise or criticism of people or attitudes involved in the event. The fact that no human being but the Buddha was present to record some of the exclamations reported in the Udāna–such as those in 1:1, 1:2, 1:3, 1:7, 2:1, 3:10–suggests that he himself played a role in the shaping of the genre, for these events wouldn't have been recorded unless he had reported them to others. But whether the idea of collecting these pieces as a distinct genre originated with him or with his disciples, we have no way of knowing.

What we can know, however, when we look carefully at the form and content of the Udāna as a whole, is that a cohesive set of values runs throughout the collection. We also find that those values run directly counter to the values of domestic society in the Buddha's time: stating, for instance, that brahmans–people worthy of respect–are made and not born; and that the happiness of lay life is nothing compared to the happiness of renunciation.

This last value, of course, flies in the face of the domestic values not only of the Buddha's time, but also of human society in all time. Thus the Udāna seems aimed at having a revolutionary impact on the mind of any reader raised in domestic society. To make these values palatable to the reader, the compilers employed all the literary skills at their disposal when shaping the narratives around the Buddha's explanations and organizing them into a collection. So as we look at the values expressed in the Udāna, we have to be sensitive not only to the content of the Buddha's spontaneous exclamations, but also to the form and content of the compilers' contributions in collecting them.

First, in terms of the Udāna's content, we can learn a lot, on the one hand, by looking at the types of events that inspired the Buddha to break forth with a spontaneous exclamation, and on the other, by identifying the values his exclamations express.

What kinds of events would inspire an awakened one to exclaim? When we sort the events described by the narrators into categories, we find that they fall primarily into two: those inciting a sense of pasāda (cheerful confidence) in the practice and attainment of the Dhamma, and those inciting a sense of saṁvega (dismay) over the heedlessness of those who don't practice the Dhamma. In the following list, individual udānas are indicated by their number in the collection.

Pasāda:

Celebrating the Dhamma and the Buddha's own attainment of it: 1:1, 1:2, 1:3, 1:4, 1:7, 2:1, 3:10, 6:1, 6:3, 7:7, 7:8, 8:1, 8:2, 8:3, 8:4

Celebrating the attainments of his disciples: 1:5, 1:6, 1:8, 1:10, 2:10, 3:1, 3:2, 3:3, 3:4, 3:5, 3:6, 3:7, 4:4, 4:6, 4:7, 4:9, 4:10, 5:6, 5:7, 5:10, 6:7, 7:1, 7:2, 7:5, 7:6, 8:9, 8:10

Joy in solitude: 4:5

Miraculous events: 2:8, 7:9, 8:6

In praise of the practice of giving, virtue, and meditation: 8:5

Saṁvega:

Chastising monks: 2:2, 3:8, 3:9, 4:1, 8:7

Commenting on monks' misbehavior: 4:2, 5:5, 5:8

Seeing the foolishness of other sectarians: 1:9, 2:4, 2:6, 6:4, 6:5, 6:6, 6:10

Teaching children who are harming animals: 2:3, 5:4

Teaching a king: 5:1, 6:2

Seeing hardships of domestic life: 2:5, 2:6, 2:7, 2:9, 8:8

Commenting on the foolishness/heedlessness of lay people's behavior: 2:8, 5:9, 6:8, 6:9, 7:3, 7:4

Contrasting the attainment of the Dhamma with the situation of ordinary people: 3:10, 8:6

In response to a death: 2:7, 4:3, 5:2, 5:3, 7:10, 8:8

It's interesting to note that the emotions of pasāda and saṁvega are paired rarely in the Canon but frequently in later Theravāda texts focusing on the emotions to be developed when visiting memorials to the Buddha, such as stūpas or Buddha images. Pasāda is the appropriate response to feel when reflecting that the Buddha's total unbinding (parinibbāna) transcended birth and death because he had awakened to the birthless, deathless dimension (8:1, 8:3, 8:4). Saṁvega is the appropriate response when reflecting on your own situation, subject to repeated rebirths and redeaths as long you have yet to awaken to that dimension yourself.

Thus the experience of reading the Udāna is like that of gaining inspiration from a stūpa or Buddha image–a point reinforced not only by its explicit reference to the dimension beyond birth and death in 8:3 and 8:4, but also by the large number of deaths mentioned throughout the collection. It's also reinforced by the way in which the deaths of those who have not reached awakening (2:7, 4:3, 4:8, 5:2, 8:8) are contrasted with the deaths of those who have (1:10, 5:3, 7:10, 8:9, 8:10, and the foreshadowing of the Buddha's own death in 6:1 and 8:5). When an unawakened person dies, it's a cause for saṁvega; when an awakened person dies, a cause for pasāda–although in the case of Suppabuddha the leper (5:3), his death is a cause for both: saṁvega over the past kamma that led to his present rebirth as a leper, and pasāda for the fact that, having gained the Dhamma-eye just before dying, he is now a prominent deva in the heaven of the Thirty-three.

It's also interesting to note from these lists how often the narratives in the Udāna focus on celebrating the accomplishments of the Buddha's disciples, a point to which we will return below.

Just as it's instructive to note what would cause the Buddha to exclaim, it's also instructive to note what doesn't: He never exclaims over the beauty of the body or of material possessions, the wealth or power of those who govern, the joys of a loving relationship, or a kindness done to him personally. In other words, he doesn't exclaim over the things that people in domestic society normally value. This fact relates directly to the values that his exclamations express.

To understand these values, it's useful to map them against a list found elsewhere in the Canon, in the Buddha's instructions to his foster mother concerning the eight basic values that determine which dhammas–teachings, actions, qualities of mind–qualify categorically as true Dhamma. Again, in the following list, udānas expressing a particular value are identified by their numbers in the collection. Individual udānas expressing more than one value are listed more than once.

> "As for the dhammas of which you may know, 'These dhammas lead:

to dispassion, not to passion [1:7, 2:1, 2:8, 3:10, 4:4, 7:3, 7:4];

to being unfettered, not to being fettered [1:1, 1:2, 1:3, 1:5, 1:8, 1:9, 1:10, 2:1, 2:4, 2:10, 3:2, 3:4, 3:5, 3:6, 3:10, 4:4, 4:9, 4:10, 6:1, 6:3, 6:4, 6:6, 6:7, 6:8, 6:9, 6:10, 7:1, 7:2, 7:3, 7:4, 7:5, 7:6, 7:7, 7:8, 7:9, 7:10, 8:1, 8:2, 8:3, 8:4, 8:5, 8:6, 8:7, 8:8, 8:9, 8:10];

to shedding, not to accumulating [1:4, 2:4, 4:8, 7:9, 7:10]; to modesty, not to self-aggrandizement [3:1, 3:8, 5:9, 6:4, 6:5]; to contentment, not to discontent [1:6, 2:1, 2:10, 3:7, 4:6];

to seclusion, not to entanglement [1:8, 2:1, 2:5, 2:6, 2:7, 2:8, 2:9, 3:3, 3:9, 4:2, 4:5, 4:6, 5:6, 6:2, 8:7, 8:8]; to aroused persistence, not to laziness [2:2, 3:1, 3:3, 4:1, 4:2, 4:3, 4:6, 4:7, 5:2, 5:3, 5:5, 5:7, 5:8, 5:10, 8:5]; to being unburdensome, not to being burdensome' [1:6, 2:3, 3:7, 3:9, 5:1, 5:4]:

> You may categorically hold, 'This is the Dhamma, this is the Vinaya, this is the Teacher's instruction.'" – AN 8:53

The first thing to notice about these values is that, even though they are closely interrelated, they can be divided into three sorts: those touching on the goal of the practice (dispassion, being unfettered), those touching on internal virtues needed to reach that goal (shedding, contentment, aroused persistence), and those touching on one's relations with others in the course of the practice (modesty, seclusion, and being unburdensome). In each case, these values are all noble–which means that nothing is lost when you engage in putting them to the test. Even if you don't attain the ultimate goal, you have developed qualities worthy of inner and outer respect, at the same time alleviating a fair amount of suffering in the here and now.

Also notice that all eight values are expressed in the Udāna. Far and away, the largest number of udānas focus on values related to the goal–dispassion and being unfettered–but in doing so, they also provide motivation for developing the virtues and values needed to attain that goal. This motivation is important, for all of these values, as we have noted, run counter to the common values of domestic society–as expressed both in the particular structures of Indian society in the Buddha's time, and in the common values of domesticity in human cultures across time.

For instance, the values of dispassion and being unfettered run counter to the pursuit of sensuality and to the sense of "I," "mine," "we," and "ours" that underlie family life. The value of shedding runs counter to the domestic desire to accumulate as a protection against future lack; because this value includes the shedding of pride, it also runs counter to the desire for prominence in social affairs. The value of contentment runs counter to the domestic concern with accumulating wealth and stockpiling for the future; the value of modesty, counter to the desire for fame and recognition; and the value of seclusion, counter to the domestic desire to be surrounded by loved ones. The value of being unburdensome, on its face, coincides with the domestic value of frugality, but on a deeper level–in light of the fact that the act of creating a family places extra burdens on the environment to feed and support more people–it counsels celibacy as the ideal way to be unburdensome. Thus it runs directly counter to the domestic idea that the creation of a family is a gift to the world. As for persistence, both the Dhamma and domestic society value persistence in the pursuit of one's aims, but they differ widely in their understanding of what those aims should be.

All of this means that the task of the Udāna is to convey–and make convincing–the countercultural message that the reader would be wise to focus on the drawbacks of many of the values and structures in which he/she has been nurtured since childhood, and to see the advantages of taking on a more demanding set of values in their place.

This task, in turn, relates directly to the form of the Udāna as a collection, for it shows clear signs of having been consciously and skillfully shaped to present a coherent impression and message. It's not simply a stenographic account of all the Buddha's explanations or a random set of texts arranged so that they would be easy to memorize.

The fact that the Udāna was consciously shaped can easily be seen by comparing it with the rest of the Pali Canon. On the one hand, the Udāna does not contain all the Buddha's exclamations recorded in the Canon. Appendix Two contains the three accounts of the Buddha's exclamations that the Udāna's compilers did not include in their collection, and a glance at these accounts helps to suggest why: In one case (SN 56:11), the exclamation was too short to convey much of a meaning. In the other two, there is no record of any event whose significance–sparking either saṁvega or pasāda–incited the Buddha to exclaim. In both of these latter two incidents, the Buddha also had to explain the exclamation to his audience. Thus these cases did not fit into the pattern of the udāna genre.

On the other hand, there are six passages in the Kosala-Saṁyutta and Māra-Saṁyutta (SN 3 and 4) that follow the form of the udānas: a short narrative, followed by the formula, "Then, on realizing the significance/meaning of that, the Blessed One on that occasion…" but instead of exclaiming, the Buddha is said simply to have "spoken these verses." Aside from this small discrepancy, this formula is exclusive to the udānas.

As it turns out, one of these passages has a direct parallel, and another a near parallel, in the Udāna itself. (See Appendix Three.) All of this suggests that these passages may have been part of the original collection of udānas but later were moved to the Saṁyutta instead. Similarly, but at one step further removed, several suttas included in the Bhikkhu-saṁyutta (SN 21) lack the standard udāna formula but otherwise follow the udāna format in presenting a common udāna theme: the Buddha commenting in verse on the good or bad behavior of his monks. In fact one of these suttas–SN 21:7–is a near parallel with Ud 7:5. Thus these suttas might have originally been udānas that were later moved to the Saṁyutta as well. Because nothing in the content or form of any of these Saṁyutta passages differs from the udānas included in the Udāna, there is the possibility that the monks who made the final selection simply wanted the number of passages in the Udāna to equal a round eighty, the number of years in the Buddha's life.

The conscious shaping of the Udāna is also apparent when we look at its overall arrangement, for it shows a literary sensibility at work. First, there is the narrative arc of the whole. It begins with the Buddha's awakening, includes several passages that foreshadow the Buddha's final unbinding (nibbāna)–the final unbinding of Bāhiya in 1:10, the narratives of the Buddha's last year in 6:1 and 8:5, and the discussions of unbinding in 8:1-4–and ends with the final unbinding of another one of his disciples, Ven. Dabba Mallaputta. The form of the genre would not have allowed the collection to end with the Buddha's own final unbinding–he wouldn't have been present to comment on the meaning of the event–and so Ven. Dabba Mallaputta's final unbinding is made to stand in for the Buddha's, thus giving narrative closure to the whole.

Underlying this narrative arc are two doctrinal arcs. The first lies in the fact that the udānas of the first four chapters focus on basic principles–the true brahman (the person worthy of admiration) in the first chapter, true bliss in the second, the ideal monk in the third, and the importance of training the mind in the fourth–whereas all of the udānas in the last two chapters focus on the theme of being unfettered. The collection thus starts with basics and ends with the ultimate goal.

The second doctrinal arc starts with the description of dependent co-arising in the first three udānas. While this teaching is by no means simple or elementary, it is basic in the sense that it provides the framework for understanding one of the more difficult teachings in the collection: the arahant's abandoning of any sense of personal identity–a point mentioned in 2:1, 4:1, 6:6, and 7:1, and graphically symbolized in 8:9 and 8:10. In this way the first udānas introduce a string of udānas that help to explain how what in the last two udānas looks like annihilation actually is not: Instead, it is simply the ending of suffering and the attainment of an indescribable destination, beyond location, that brings unwavering bliss.

Within these overall arcs, many of the individual udānas play off of one another in a dialog on recurring themes. For instance, 3:2, 3:3, and 3:4 all comment on how the ideal monk's mind is like rock, a point illustrated in the narrative to 4:4, in which Ven. Sāriputta's mind is shown to be even stronger than rock. The proper attitude of the alms-going monk is the focus of 1:5, 3:7, and 3:8, and this in turn highlights a recurring narrative motif: Many of the Buddha's exclamations are inspired by observations on lay life that he or the monks make while going on alms. This shows that alms-going was not only a means of physical support for the monks, but also an opportunity for them to reflect on the Dhamma.

Other recurring themes include the jealousy of other sectarians over the support given to the Buddha and his disciples (2:4, 4:8), and the difference between the way in which pain is handled by unawakened people on the one hand (2:6) and by the Buddha and his disciples on the other (2:7, 3:1, 4:4, 8:5). There are also three udānas on the misery of having children (2:6-8) and three on the theme of not harming others, in which–with no little irony–the Buddha teaches King Pasenadi the same message in 5:1 that he teaches two groups of boys tormenting animals in 2:3 and 5:4.

There is also a recurring pattern of imagery, as when the clearing of the well water in 7:9 foreshadows the clearing of the river in 8:5. And, as we have noted above, the most prominent recurring theme concerns the difference between the death of those who haven't gained awakening and the death of those who have. All of these elements give an overall unity to the collection.

This sense of unity is augmented by the fact that the collection has a dominant aesthetic savor (rasa). Ancient Indian aesthetic treatises focused a great deal of attention to the theory of savor, to the point where "savor" became the central technical term in Indian aesthetics. Critics wrote volumes on how savor gave unity to a work of art and on the techniques for best conveying it. The basic theory was this: Artistic composition expressed states of emotion or states of mind called "vibhāva" or "bhāva." According to the earliest treatises, which were apparently known in the Buddha's time, there are eight basic emotions: love, humor, grief, anger, energy, fear, disgust, and astonishment. The reader or listener exposed to the presentation of these emotion did not participate in them directly; instead, he/she savored them as an aesthetic experience at one remove from the emotion. Thus, the savor of grief is not grief but compassion. The savor of energy is not energy itself but admiration for heroism. The savor of love is not love but an experience of sensitivity. The savor of astonishment is a sense of the astounding. The proof of the indirectness of the aesthetic experience was that some of the basic emotions were decidedly unpleasant, while the savor of the emotion was to be enjoyed.

Although a work of art might depict many emotions, and thus–like a good meal–offer many savors for the reader/listener to taste, one savor was supposed to dominate. I have noted elsewhere that the dominant savor of the Dhammapada is the heroic. In the Udāna, the dominant savor is the astounding (abbhūta), and it is conveyed on many levels. On the most obvious level are the many events that the narrative itself describes as amazing and astounding. These range from the perfectly natural–such as the amazing stubbornness of the monk in 5:5–to the more singular–the Buddha's ability to see through the disguised ascetics in 6:2, the abrupt end of the verbal abuse of the monks in 4:8, and amazing and astounding qualities of the Dhamma & Vinaya described in 5:5–to the outright supernatural–such as the most improbable event in the entire collection: Suppavāsā's unnaturally long pregnancy and labor issuing in a healthy child just as the Buddha says, "May Suppavāsā the Koliyan-daughter be well & free from disease. And may she deliver a son free from disease." (2:8) Other supernatural events include the Buddha's taking Nanda to the heaven of the Thirty-three in 3:2, his crossing the river in 8:6, the clearing of the well in 7:9, the clearing of the river in 8:5, Ven. Dabba Mallaputta's final display of his powers in 8:9, and many others.

Before proceeding to the other levels on which the astounding savor is conveyed in the Udāna, it's necessary to point out that–in line with the theory of savor just mentioned–the collection conveys subsidiary savors as well, both to augment the astounding and to counteract its excesses. The primary augmenting savor is the heroic, the foremost example being the Buddha's behavior in 8:5 after his final illness: Not only does he continue walking to Kusinarā despite his weakness and pain, but he also has the compassion to make sure that Cunda, the donor of his final meal, is never made to feel regret for having given the food that brought on his final illness. Other examples of heroism in the collection include Ven. Saṅgāmaji's firm response to his previous wife's use of his son as bait in 1:8, the endurance of the unnamed monk in the face of pain in 3:1, and Ven. Sāriputta's ability to withstand the yakkha's blow in 4:4.

The primary leavening savor in the Udāna is humor. This is to counteract the tendency of the astounding savor, if over-emphasized, to become unbelievable, and thus ridiculous in the eyes of the reader. To counter this reaction, the narrators add a dash of humor when relating the most astonishing events to show that, no, they have not lost their sense of reality. For instance, after treating the story of Suppavāsā's pregnancy, the compilers add the humor of the discussion between Ven. Moggallana and his supporter, along with the humor of the final scene, in which Suppavāsā, thrilling over her son, states that she would be willing to go through the same misery seven times more. Also there is the humor in the story of Ven. Nanda, as his fellow monks, after hearing of his deal with the Buddha, treat him sardonically like a man who has sold himself for a price.

Other examples of humor in the collection include Ven. Ānanda's obtuseness in 3:3 and 5:5, Ven. Sāriputta's "slight headache" in 4:4, the reflections of the bull elephant in 4:5, Queen Mallikā's frank rebuff of King Pasenadi's advances in 5:1, the famous story of the blind men and the elephant in 6:4, and Ven. Sāriputta's teaching Ven. Bhaddiya the Dwarf, not knowing that Ven. Bhaddiya has already attained arahantship, in 7:2. All of these touches of humor–and there are others–help to establish a sense of rapport between the narrators and the reader, thus making the blatantly astounding events in the collection, if not more believable, at least more palatable.

There is one savor, however, that is studiously avoided throughout the collection, and that is the horrific, the savor associated with disgust. On two occasions when the story risks getting into disgusting details, the narrative avoids direct language. The first instance is in the story of Sundarī, the lady wanderer killed by her fellow wanderers in 4:8. When they dig up her body, the narrative simply refers to their digging up "what they had buried." The second instance is in the story of the Buddha's final illness in 8:5. When he develops dysentery, the illness is not mentioned by name. Instead, it is a "severe illness with blood." In this way, the horrific savor is carefully avoided so as not to spoil the astounding.

In addition to cultivating the astounding savor by narrating astounding events, the Udāna also conveys it in more subtle ways. To begin with, there is what may be called the cast of characters. In AN 1, the Buddha lists his foremost disciples–male and female, ordained and lay–citing the area(s) in which each is pre-eminent. Of these, 22 of his 40 foremost monk disciples and three of his ten foremost lay female disciples appear in the Udāna (see Appendix Four). In five udānas we actually get to see the events–or examples of the events–that led the Buddha to single these individuals out for praise: Ven. Mahā Kassapa's practice of strictness in 1:6 and 3:7; Bāhiya's quick awakening in 1:10; Ven. Moggallana's psychic acuity in 4:4; Ven. Soṇa's fine recitation in 5:6; and Suppavāsā's gift of meals in 2:8. In other cases, the Buddha gives his prominent disciples more general praise; and in others, we simply get to see these disciples in action.

As we noted above, the most frequent instigation for the Buddha's exclamations is in celebration of his disciples' attainments. So it is only fitting that many of his foremost disciples appear in the collection, lending a sense of heightened occasion to the narrated events. But what adds a more genuine touch of the astounding to the savor of the text is the way in which their stories are handled. This is apparent in the treatment both of the monks and of the female lay disciples.

It would have been all too easy for the compilers of the Udāna simply to bask in the reflected glory of the pre-eminent monks as a way of advertising their own worth as a field of merit. And, admittedly, an air of competitiveness with rival sectarians pervades the collection, with the support and respect accorded to the Saṅgha frequently contrasted with the lack of support accorded to other sects. There is also the strong contrast between the noble and heroic behavior of the pre-eminent monks and the way in which other sectarians are made to look petty (2:4), ridiculous (6:4), ignorant (6:10), and vile (4:8).

However, that's not all there is to the treatment, for not all the monks are portrayed in a flattering light. In fact, there are more udānas focused on the misbehavior of monks than there are on the misbehavior of rival sectarians. Thus the simple fact that a monk is a member of the Saṅgha does not mean that he is automatically worthy of admiration. The text sets an extremely high standard for what makes a person a true monk. In this way it portrays an ideal toward which the monks should strive, at the same time informing the laity of how to judge who is truly worthy of their respect.

A similar impressive maturity is found in the treatment of the stories of Lady Visākhā and Suppavāsā, both of whom the Buddha cited for their pre-eminence in giving material support to the Saṅgha. It would have been easy for the compilers to focus simply on their generosity–or the pleasant rewards of their generosity–as a way of encouraging the generosity of others. Had they done so, it would have confirmed the common stereotype that monks see women only in the role of donors. But that's not how the text treats these women at all. Both are portrayed as suffering–from the pains (2:8) and sorrows (8:8) of family life, and from disappointment in business dealings (2:9)–a fair warning that generosity to the Saṅgha is not always quickly rewarded. And the Buddha's attitude toward both is admirable. Instead of sweet-talking them into even more generosity or humoring their weaknesses, he chides them for their heedlessness: somewhat gently in Lady Visākhā's case; startlingly abrupt in Suppavāsā's. This shows that his main concern was with their true welfare, and in particular with showing them that they shouldn't fall prey to society's demand that they look for their primary happiness in bearing and raising children.

In this way the Udāna's cast of characters lends the savor of the astounding to the collection not only in the eminence of the individuals, but also in the mature way in which their stories are treated.

A touch of the astounding flavors the collection's treatment not only of the Saṅgha but also of the Dhamma. Although a few specific Dhamma teachings are explained (as in 4:1, 6:2, and 8:6), most of the standard teachings, such as the four noble truths or the five aggregates, are not even mentioned. The few standard lists that are mentioned are complex and presented as unexplained lists. The collection opens (1:1-3) with an unadorned statement of what the Buddha called his deepest and most complex teaching–dependent co-arising–completely devoid of preparation or explanation. The seven lists in the wings to awakening are mentioned, again without explanation, in 5:5, where they are described simply as amazing and astounding. The complexity of kamma (action) is touched on in 4:3, 5:2, and 5:3, but never really clarified. And two particularly abstruse topics of meditation are mentioned–again without explanation–in 7:7 and 7:8. The only detailed meditation instructions given in the collection are those the Buddha teaches to Bāhiya in 1:10, but from the context these are clearly appropriate only for a person on the verge of awakening. There is no explanation of how an aspiring meditator should practice to attain that advanced level. All of this gives the impression that the compilers of the Udāna were interested less in clarifying the techniques of Dhamma practice than in conveying a sense of how astounding and marvelous they are.

The text also makes use of poetic figures (alaṅkāra) to intensify the astounding savor. I have commented on some of the more technical figures in the notes to individual udānas. Here I would like to focus on two of the most prominent figures in the collection as a whole: paradox and contrast.

Paradox augments the astounding savor by surprising the reader. Some of the paradoxes in the Udāna deal in imagery, such as the observations that people are not cleaned by water (1:9) and that rain soddens what is concealed, but not what is left open (5:5). Other paradoxes deal on the level of ideas, such as the assertion that self-love is the basis of compassion (5:1, 5:4), or that release from becoming is achieved neither through becoming nor non-becoming (3:10). The deepest use of paradox, however, deals with the fact that unbinding, the goal of the practice, lies beyond the dichotomies inherent in human thought and language. Thus

8:10, while stating that the destination of the arahant after death cannot be described, characterizes it as unwavering bliss. This, in turn, seems to contradict 1:10, which describes it as freedom from bliss and pain. The verses in 6:3 and 8:2 suggest that unbinding is more like a nothing, whereas 8:1 suggests that it is a something. The exclamation in 8:1 also states that unbinding cannot be described either as a staying or a moving. The exclamation in 8:4 asserts that it doesn't fall into the categories of here, there, or between the two, echoing a point from the Buddha's instructions in 1:10. All of these paradoxes serve notice that ultimate freedom is something that defies even the most basic categories of thought.

There is also an element of paradox in the way the Udāna reverses the conventional values of domestic society. Because the brahmans of the time were vociferously advancing the idea that they were superior to others because of their birth–the ancient Indian form of racism–there's a certain amount of shock value in the fact that the collection opens with a series of exclamations that redefine how a person becomes a brahman–not through birth, but through the cultivation of the mind (1:4-6, 1:9). Similarly, there is an implicit reversal of conventional domestic ideas of happiness as the collection repeatedly makes the point that loved ones, sensuality, power, and responsibilities actually bring misery, whereas the highest bliss lies in being unpossessive to the point of abandoning the conceit, "I am" (2:1, 4:1, 6:6, 7:1). Perhaps the most shocking rejection of domestic values is in 1:8, where the Buddha praises Ven. Saṅgāmaji for not even looking at his little son.

Because the paradoxes concerning unbinding might seem nonsensical on the surface, and because the frequent rejection of domestic values goes against the grain, the collection makes heavy use of contrast to emphasize the point that things are not always what they seem. This contrast is most prominent in the story of the false ascetics in 6:2, in the famous story of the blind men and the elephant in 6:4, and in the contrast between Ven. Bhaddiya the Dwarf's physical appearance and the description of his mind as a beautiful chariot in 7:5. However, the contrast between appearance and reality plays a role in many other udānas as well, such as 2:7, 2:8, 2:10, 3:2, 3:6, 3:7, 4:1, 4:8, 5:3, 5:5, 7:1, 7:2, 7:10, 8:5, and 8:7. These contrasts help to make concrete the point that paradoxical teachings should not be rejected because of surface contradictions, for they may speak of a level of experience that is not below logic but above and beyond it.

The contrasts in the Udāna occur not only within individual udānas but also between them. This higher level of contrast occurs frequently throughout the text, but most strikingly in chapters two and eight. In chapter two–which is devoted to the topic of pleasure and bliss–five of the stories, 2:5-9, focus on the actual miseries inherent in the supposed joys of lay life: having children and engaging in business affairs. These are then sharply contrasted with the story of Ven. Bhaddiya in 2:10, who rejoices in the joys of living at the root of a tree and his release from the worries of kingship.

There's a similar strong contrast in chapter eight. The story of Ven. Nāgasamāla in 8:7, suffering for not following the Buddha's choice of which path to take–a story that is surely meant to have symbolic overtones–contrasts strongly with the preceding udāna, in which the monks who follow the Buddha are carried by his psychic power effortlessly over the flooding river. Similarly, the story of Lady Visākhā, mourning the death of her grandchild in 8:8, contrasts with the following udāna, in which Ven. Dabba Mallaputta voluntarily heads for death with a final display of his psychic powers. In this way, the astounding savor of these psychic displays is augmented by contrasting them so directly with ordinary mundane human failings.

In fact, the formal nature of the udāna genre, focused on the Buddha's exclamations, seems designed to emphasize this element of contrast. As we have seen, when the Buddha exclaims, it is usually from one of two strongly contrasting emotions: saṁvega and pasāda. Because of the strong contrast between these two emotions, the act of collecting stories around these exclamations naturally heightens the savor of the astounding by placing them in sharp contrast with one another.

And there are other ways in which the formal structure of the Udāna helps to convey the savor of the astounding. For example, in 8:5 the story of the Buddha's final illness is told in a combination of prose and epic-like verse, a form called the campū, which heightens the sense of the importance of the events. Because, chronologically, this is the last story in the collection, leading up to the Buddha's final exclamation, this heightened style adds to the solemnity of the narrative.

Then there is the basic format of each udāna text. As we have noted, each narrative ends with the formula (or a close variation of it): "Then, on realizing the significance/meaning (attha) of that, the Blessed One on that occasion exclaimed." This formula assigns the Buddha's exclamations to two categories of poetry explained in a discourse elsewhere in the Pali Canon (AN 4:231–4:230 in the Pali Text Society (PTS) version):

> "Monks, there are these four kinds of poets. Which four? The thought-poet, the heard-poet, the meaning (attha)-poet, and the extemporaneous poet. These are the four kinds of poets."

The discourse doesn't explain these four, but the Commentary notes that the thought-poet invents stories, the heard-poet retells old legends, the meaning-poet gets to the meaning of things, and the extemporaneous poet comes up with a new poem on the spot.

Of the four, the meaning-poet and the extemporaneous poet require the most skill, and to combine these two skills is a sign of genuine accomplishment: a level of accomplishment that the udāna formula assigns directly to the Buddha. In calling his statements "exclamations," the formula asserts that his remarks were extemporaneous; in stating that they were inspired by his understanding of the significance/meaning of the event, the formula categorizes him as a meaning-poet. And he is able to find meaning not only in extraordinary events, but also in some of the most ordinary imaginable: boys hitting a snake with a stick (2:3), men fighting over a woman (6:8), women wanting more children and grandchildren (2:8, 8:8). The Buddha's ability to combine these two skills in this way, grasping the meaning and expressing it memorably on the spur of the moment, is–from a strictly literary point of view–one of the most astounding aspects of the udāna texts.

This, in turn, relates to one of the most basic features of the udāna genre: the fact that the Buddha plays a double role in all of these pieces, both as a character in the stories and as the author of the comments on the stories. The way the compilers handle the stories–both in the choice and organization of events, and in their use of literary technique to foster the astounding savor–capitalizes on this double role in two ways.

The first, of course, is to help clarify the Buddha's exclamations, showing what led him to exclaim in the way he did. The second is to give his exclamations more credence and weight. As a character in the stories, he is shown to be capable and upright: a person of reliable character who has mastered an amazing range of skills and who has trained others to become skilled as well, capable of finding an amazingly satisfying happiness. Thus when he states values that go against common social norms, he is not to be dismissed as someone who has failed to live up to social standards. He has seen the limitations of those standards by developing an integrity and a range of skills that go beyond them.

Similarly, as a partial author of the text, he is shown to be extremely capable in expressing what he has to say. Thus, when he states that unbinding lies beyond the structures of language, it's not because he is deficient in his mastery of language. It's because he knows, through a high level of mastery, the limits of precisely how far language can go.

In this way, the udāna genre helps give extra meaning to the Buddha's exclamations in two senses of the term: "meaning" in the sense of helping to explain what the words signify, and "meaning" in the sense of having value for the reader. Of course, the fact that the compilers of the Udāna were skilled with words does not prove that the values they promote actually do lead to an unfettered freedom beyond the values of words and social norms. The ultimate test of the meaning of the udānas for you will lie in your own practice: your willingness to learn the techniques of the practice from other parts of the Canon and from reliable members of the Saṅgha, and to apply them in your thoughts, words, and deeds. But my hope is that the act of reading the Udāna will help convince you that there is value in giving the Buddha's teachings a fair try.

On Reading the Udāna

The Udāna's focus on communicating values to revolutionize the heart and mind of the reader is precisely where it runs up against modern and postmodern attitudes toward finding meaning in a text. Because these attitudes are so entrenched in our culture, and because they are cited so often not only in scholarly circles but also among Buddhist practitioners, it's worth asking how useful they are when reading texts–like the Pali Canon in general, and the Udāna in particular–that offer guidance on how to attain total freedom. Because both modern and postmodern attitudes toward reading claim to be aiming at freedom for the reader, we need to look carefully at how the types of freedom they offer measure up against the freedom taught in the Pali Canon, to see whether–if you adopt them–they enhance or interfere with the benefits that can come from the act of reading these records of the Buddha's words.

Modern ways of reading approach pre-modern texts by asking questions first about the texts' historical reliability. In the case of the Udāna, these would cover whether udānas really were memorized during the Buddha's lifetime and, if so, how they were related to the Udāna we have at present. Were his words memorized accurately? Are the stories associated with his words accurate accounts? Could they actually have happened?

Questions of this sort can be fruitfully explored in one of two ways: by finding reliable evidence outside of a particular text against which to measure its reliability, or by searching for inconsistencies or improbabilities within the text itself. What makes this approach "modern" is that it subjects the text to the standards of materialistic empiricism established in the Enlightenment of the eighteenth century and further developed in the historical method of the nineteenth and twentieth centuries. Its purpose is to free us in the present from the irrational and ignorant superstitions of the pre-modern world.

This approach is useful when applied to texts whose historical context is well documented from other sources, and it has succeeded in exposing the weak and arbitrary foundations for many a pre-modern system of thought. But it's relatively fruitless when applied to the Udāna. To begin with, there are no outside contemporary accounts against which the history of the Pali Canon can be measured. As for internal inconsistencies, those that occur in the various recensions of the Udāna and parallel passages elsewhere in the Canon are all so minor that they do not affect the basic meaning of the text.

The text does, however, contain many elements that, from a modern materialist point of view, are highly improbable. A good number of the stories revolve around meditative powers, some of them quite extravagant, and a strictly modern reading would reject them out of hand. Many of the values expressed in the Buddha's exclamations fly in the face of a materialist view of life and death. To strip the text of these elements might satisfy a modern reader, but would leave very little behind.

And why should the narrow views of modern materialism–the views of those with little expertise in meditation–have the final word on what can and cannot be achieved through the training of the mind? Even the physical sciences of recent times are filled with discoveries about physical and chemical events that are deeply counter-intuitive; the study of non-linear systems shows that the complex interaction of even physical laws can lead to highly unlikely singularities. And that's just in the physical sciences. There's even more that we still don't know about the complex workings of the mind. If we allow ourselves to be tyrannized by the likely–and if we define "likely" in line with the views of those who lack meditative prowess–we close our minds to the possibility of the singular. There are many useful things we will never be open to learn.

This would not be a problem if the modern approach could provide a freedom equal to or greater than the freedom to which the Udāna points. You could simply ignore the Udāna and other texts in the Pali Canon, and still gain liberation. But the problem is that the modern approach leaves us trapped in our historically conditioned assumptions about what seems reasonable and likely.

The Romantics recognized this trap and rebelled against it, and postmodern theory continues this rebellion. Yet despite their quest for freedom, these two approaches, too, work against allowing the values of a text like the Udāna to have a truly revolutionary effect on the heart and mind. This is because each, in its own way, places the reader's pre-existing values over and above any values that might be absorbed from a text.

Their rationales for doing so, however, are quite different. The Romantics–and the American Transcendentalists who followed them–posited a common source of inspiration within the deepest part of each person. According to them, authors and readers throughout time have had access within to the same source of inspiration. To understand which meanings within an ancient text might have value in our day and age, we need only check the text against the original source deep in our own minds. Wherever the author's expression differs from this inner sense of inspiration, it can simply be rejected as no longer relevant. Whatever resonates with this inner sense of inspiration can be accepted as trustworthy and true.

This approach, however, leaves no room for the possibility that a person like the Buddha could have realized truths about experience that are not already available to the reader. In other words–contrary to a basic principle of the Buddha's teaching–there was nothing special or singular about the Buddha's awakening. The only teachings of any value derived from that awakening are those that agree with what the reader already feels deep down inside to be true. There is nothing really new to be learned from the Udāna or from any Buddhist text. The only reason to read them is to confirm what we already know.

The postmodern approach leads to a similar conclusion but via a different route, for it denies the existence of any common inner source of meaning. Instead, it maintains that authors and readers can know nothing but the arbitrary systems of values to which they have been exposed at their point in history–systems that are inherently suspect because they are created and propagated by social structures of power. (This postmodern theory is called poststructuralism because it arose in reaction to structuralism, the theory that the structures of human thought are innate to the human mind.) Thus, from this point of view, a fully reliable source of meaning is nowhere to be found. As a result, postmodern ways of reading a text–although they start with the Romantic realization that modern ways of reading can't produce the freedom they promise–tend to be even less willing than the modern or Romantic approach to be changed by the values expressed in any text.

This attitude is most often based on an observation from poststructuralist theory: that a text–regardless of the conscious intentions of the author–may be the product of a structure of meanings and values inherent in language that is oppressive to the reader, no matter how rational or objective it may seem. Freedom from that oppression can be maintained only by digging up and exposing those structures, and by reading the text in a way that is resistant to those values. From this observation comes the argument that the most liberating way to read a text is to approach it with a sense of suspicion and to create one's own meanings–and sometimes one's own personal language–out of it, and to ignore whatever the author(s) had in mind. The fact that this approach is applied even to modern texts is what makes it postmodern. And, just as the modern approach has exposed the arbitrary foundations of oppressive patterns of thought in pre-modern texts and institutions, the postmodern approach has done the same for many seemingly rational but oppressive patterns in texts and institutions from the modern period.

It can, however, fall into the trap of the poststructuralist paradox: that the reader's own values and reading of a text may be shaped unconsciously by structures that are equally–if not more–oppressive than the unconscious values expressed in the text. Thus a suspicious reading of a text may often leave the reader more entrenched in his/her own preexisting state of oppression than before. And, in fact, poststructuralist theory holds little hope that a human being could ever gain freedom from value structures. Meanings, it insists, point only to other systems of meanings, which in turn point to other systems of meanings, ad infinitum, never arriving at any experience in-and-of-itself. Thus the quest for liberation is an always on-going process doomed never fully to succeed.

Never. This is where poststructuralist values depart most radically from the Dhamma. Although there is a recent fashion to apply poststructuralist theory to the act of reading and interpreting the Pali Canon, it's hard to imagine a system of values more at odds with what the Buddha, as portrayed in the Canon, had to say: that total freedom is possible, that strategies of values and practice can be used to reach it–at which point they are put aside–and that the teachings contained in the Canon are among those strategies. Anyone who is content to regard total freedom as an impossibility and would prefer to hold to a postmodern identity is free to maintain a poststructuralist attitude to the Canon. But if you'd like to test to see if the Buddha was right, you have to bring a different attitude and set of assumptions to the act of reading the Canon's message.

Fortunately, the Pali Canon is not a text like the Bible, demanding total, unquestioning acceptance. It assumes the authority, not of your creator who has the right to tell you what and what not to believe, but of an expert, someone who has found the way to total freedom and offers to show how you can find that freedom yourself.

The primary working hypothesis when testing this expert's teaching is that total freedom is possible. Thus, contrary to poststructuralist theory, you have to assume that some experiences are not embedded in structures of meaning created by human minds. This is not that difficult an assumption to make. After all, there's physical pain. You don't need to run pain through an interpretive structure in order to experience it. You first encountered it well before you knew anything of signs or words. However, the Buddha noted that there are two primary responses to pain–bewilderment and a search for how to put an end to it (AN 6:63)–and from these responses we tend to develop systems of values and meanings that, because they are ignorant, lead only to more mental suffering.

The second working hypothesis in testing the Buddha's recommendations for ending this suffering is this: that the basic pattern underlying any attachment to these oppressive systems of values and meanings is constant regardless of culture. In other words, the way we cling to these meanings is the same regardless of their content or our culture. Otherwise, a path taught to alleviate suffering in India more than 2,500 years ago would be irrelevant to our problem of suffering now. Again, the commonality of suffering is not a difficult assumption to make, for the Buddha's basic image of how and why we suffer is the act of feeding, both physically and mentally. This is something common to all beings, and not just human beings living in social structures. We all suffer from the need to feed, regardless of how the details of this need are shaped by culture.

From these two assumptions, we can see precisely what the Buddha asks us to test: his strategy of feeding the mind in new ways that give it the strength to reach a dimension where it no longer needs to feed. Part of this strategy is to adopt skillful structures of value and meaning–called appropriate attention and right view–that focus on the problem of suffering in a way that dismantles attachment to unskillful structures and, ultimately, even to themselves. This way they dismantle all attachment (AN 10:93), leading to a different type of experience beyond the need to feed, and beyond interpretation: unbinding, total freedom from any and all conditions.

This claim means that the texts derive their meaning and value from how helpful they are in accomplishing this freedom. Because they themselves cannot provide this liberation for you, but only point out the techniques and values that can lead there, the test of their validity depends on your actually adopting their teachings in your actions and then gauging the results. And because the goal to which they point, freedom from suffering, is something you can potentially touch directly, the guarantee of their validity lies ultimately in your own honest experience.

At the same time, however, the texts do set some conditions on what counts as a valid test. Even though you're not asked to accept without question whatever the Pali texts say, if you're interested in putting an end to suffering, you have to develop within yourself the qualities that will make you a competent judge of their message.

This will require energy, dedication, and time. And this, in turn, requires a special attitude toward reading the discourses, approaching them with openness and respect. In other words, you experiment to see where you are taken by the working hypothesis that the monks who assembled them knew something of value and were basically honest in their desire to transmit it to later generations, you included. The texts recognize that there can be errors of transmission (DN 16), so respect does not mean accepting without question whatever the texts say. But it does mean giving them the benefit of the doubt until you can meet the conditions of a valid test and determine what does and doesn't actually work in leading to true freedom.

A large part of the "something of value" transmitted in the Canon consists of specific tactics and techniques for training the mind, but it also consists of more general values and principles. This, as we have noted, is one of the Udāna's functions: to present these values in an appealing and "savorful" way. Yet the Canon treats even values and principles as actions–attitudes that inform a larger strategy of practice–which means that they, too, can be tested. Thus, as with all the texts in the Canon, the act of reading the Udāna is not meant as an end in & of itself, as an opportunity to enjoy its astonishing and humorous savor. Instead, it's meant as a challenge for you to test whether the values it expresses, when adopted as working hypotheses, really do lead to the singular and ultimate savor of the Dhamma (5:5): the savor of release.

1 : Awakening

Ud 1:1 Awakening (1) (Bodhi Sutta)

I have heard that on one occasion, the Blessed One was staying at Uruvelā on the bank of the Nerañjarā River at the root of the Bodhi tree–the tree of awakening–newly awakened. And on that occasion he sat at the root of the Bodhi tree for seven days in one session, sensitive to the bliss of release. Then, with the passing of seven days, after emerging from that concentration, in the first watch of the night, he gave close attention to dependent co-arising in forward order,[1] thus:

When this is, that is.

From the arising of this comes the arising of that.

In other words:

From ignorance as a requisite condition come fabrications.

From fabrications as a requisite condition comes consciousness.

From consciousness as a requisite condition comes name-&-form.

From name-&-form as a requisite condition come the six sense media.

From the six sense media as a requisite condition comes contact.

From contact as a requisite condition comes feeling.

From feeling as a requisite condition comes craving.

From craving as a requisite condition comes clinging/sustenance.[2]

From clinging/sustenance as a requisite condition comes becoming.

From becoming as a requisite condition comes birth.

From birth as a requisite condition, then aging-&-death, sorrow, lamentation, pain, distress, and despair come into play. Such is the origination of this entire mass of suffering & stress.[3]

Then, on realizing the significance of that, the Blessed One on that occasion exclaimed:

> As phenomena grow clear > to the brahman–ardent, in jhāna–
> his doubts all vanish
> when he discerns
> a phenomenon with its cause.

Notes

1. In the parallel passage at Mv.I.1.2, the Buddha gives attention to dependent co-arising in both forward and reverse order.

2. This hybrid word–clinging/sustenance–is a translation of the Pali term upādāna. Upādāna has a hybrid meaning because it is used to cover two sides of a physical process metaphorically applied to the mind: the act of clinging whereby a fire takes sustenance from a piece of fuel, together with the sustenance offered by the fuel. On the level of the mind, upādāna denotes both the act of clinging and the object clung to, which together give sustenance to the process of becoming and its attendant factors leading to suffering and stress. For more on this image and its implications for the practice, see The Mind Like Fire Unbound.

3. Notice that dependent co-arising (paṭicca samuppāda) is expressed in terms of processes–of events and actions–without reference to a framework containing those processes. In other words, it doesn't mention the existence or non-existence of agents doing the actions, or of a framework in time and space in which these processes happen. Thus it makes possible a way of understanding the causes of suffering and stress without reference to the existence or non-existence of an "I" or an "other" responsible for those events. Instead, the events are viewed simply as events in the context of the process–a way of viewing that makes it possible to abandon clinging for any of these events, so as to bring suffering to an end. Even the idea of an "I" or an "other" is seen simply as part of the process (under the factors of fabrication and the sub-factor of attention under "name" in name-and-form). This is what makes possible the abandoning of any attachment to the conceit "I am," as mentioned in Ud 2:1, 4:1, 6:6, and 7:1. In this way, the treatment of dependent co-arising in the first three udānas, while terse, actually sets the stage for understanding some of the more paradoxical teachings that appear later in the collection.

For a discussion of dependent co-arising in general, see The Shape of Suffering. For further discussion of its role in framing and abandoning thoughts of "I am," see Skill in Questions, chapters 3 and 8.

Ud 1:2 Awakening (2) (Bodhi Sutta)

I have heard that on one occasion, the Blessed One was staying at Uruvelā on the bank of the Nerañjarā River at the root of the Bodhi tree–the tree of awakening–newly awakened. And on that occasion he sat at the root of the Bodhi tree for seven days in one session, sensitive to the bliss of release. Then, with the passing of seven days, after emerging from that concentration, in the second watch of the night, he gave close attention to dependent co-arising in reverse order,[1] thus:

When this isn't, that isn't.

From the cessation of this comes the cessation of that.

In other words:

From the cessation of ignorance comes the cessation of fabrications.

From the cessation of fabrications comes the cessation of consciousness.

From the cessation of consciousness comes the cessation of name-&-form.

From the cessation of name-&-form comes the cessation of the six sense media.

From the cessation of the six sense media comes the cessation of contact.

From the cessation of contact comes the cessation of feeling.

From the cessation of feeling comes the cessation of craving.

From the cessation of craving comes the cessation of clinging/sustenance.

From the cessation of clinging/sustenance comes the cessation of becoming.

From the cessation of becoming comes the cessation of birth.

From the cessation of birth, then aging-&-death, sorrow, lamentation, pain, distress, and despair all cease. Such is the cessation of this entire mass of suffering & stress.

Then, on realizing the significance of that, the Blessed One on that occasion exclaimed:

> As phenomena grow clear
> to the brahman–ardent, in jhāna–
> his doubts all vanish
> when he penetrates the ending > of requisite conditions.

Note

1. In the parallel passage at Mv.I.1.4, the Buddha gives attention to dependent co-arising in both forward and reverse order.

Ud 1:3 Awakening (3) (Bodhi Sutta)

I have heard that on one occasion, the Blessed One was staying at Uruvelā on the bank of the Nerañjarā River at the root of the Bodhi tree–the tree of awakening–newly awakened. And on that occasion he sat at the root of the Bodhi tree for seven days in one session, sensitive to the bliss of release. Then, with the passing of seven days, after emerging from that concentration, in the third watch of the night, he gave close attention to dependent co-arising in forward and reverse order, thus:

When this is, that is.

From the arising of this comes the arising of that.

When this isn't, that isn't.

From the cessation of this comes the cessation of that.

In other words:

From ignorance as a requisite condition come fabrications.

From fabrications as a requisite condition comes consciousness.

From consciousness as a requisite condition comes name-&-form.

From name-&-form as a requisite condition come the six sense media.

From the six sense media as a requisite condition comes contact.

From contact as a requisite condition comes feeling.

From feeling as a requisite condition comes craving.

From craving as a requisite condition comes clinging/sustenance.

From clinging/sustenance as a requisite condition comes becoming.

From becoming as a requisite condition comes birth.

From birth as a requisite condition, then aging-&-death, sorrow, lamentation, pain, distress, and despair come into play. Such is the origination of this entire mass of suffering & stress.

Now from the remainderless fading and cessation of that very ignorance comes the cessation of fabrications. From the cessation of fabrications comes the cessation of consciousness. From the cessation of consciousness comes the cessation of name-&-form. From the cessation of name-&-form comes the cessation of the six sense media. From the cessation of the six sense media comes the cessation of contact. From the cessation of contact comes the cessation of feeling. From the cessation of feeling comes the cessation of craving. From the cessation of craving comes the cessation of clinging/ sustenance. From the cessation of clinging/sustenance comes the cessation of becoming. From the cessation of becoming comes the cessation of birth. From the cessation of birth, then aging-&-death, sorrow, lamentation, pain, distress, and despair all cease. Such is the cessation of this entire mass of suffering & stress.

Then, on realizing the significance of that, the Blessed One on that occasion exclaimed:

> As phenomena grow clear
> to the brahman–ardent, in jhāna–
> he stands,
> routing Māra's army,
> as the sun,
> illumining the sky.[1]

Note

1. This verse is an example of a "lamp"–a poetic figure in which one word, such as an adjective or a verb, functions in two or more different clauses or sentences. The name of the figure comes from the image of the different clauses or sentences "radiating" from the one word. In this case the lamp-word is "stands." For other examples of lamps, see Ud 5:3 and Ud 8:9.

Ud 1:4 Overbearing (Huhuṅka Sutta)

I have heard that on one occasion, the Blessed One was staying at Uruvelā on the bank of the Nerañjarā River at the root of the Bodhi tree–the tree of awakening–newly awakened. And on that occasion he sat at the root of the Bodhi tree for seven days in one session, sensitive to the bliss of release. At the end of seven days, he emerged from that concentration.

Then a certain overbearing brahman went to the Blessed One and, on arrival, exchanged courteous greetings with him. After an exchange of friendly greetings & courtesies, he stood to one side. As he was standing there, he said to the Blessed One, "To what extent, Master Gotama, is one a brahman? And which are the qualities that make one a brahman?"

Then, on realizing the significance of that, the Blessed One on that occasion exclaimed:

> Any brahman
> who has banished evil qualities,[1]
> –not overbearing,
> not stained,
> his mind controlled–
> gone to the end of wisdom,[2]
> the holy life completed:[3] > Rightly would that brahman > speak the holy teaching.
> He has no swelling of pride[4] > anywhere in the world.

Notes

1. This line contains a wordplay on the words brāhmaṇa and bāhita (banished)–the same wordplay used in Dhp 388 and Ud 1:5.

2. This line plays with the term vedanta, which can mean "end of wisdom," "end of the Vedas," or "supplement to the Vedas." In the latter two cases, it would be a term referring to a brahman-by-birth who has studied all the Vedas and their supplements, but the Buddha is obviously giving this term a different meaning here.

3. Here and two lines down, the word "holy" translates brahma.
4. See Sn 4:10 and Sn 4:14.

Ud 1:5 Brahmans (Brāhmaṇa Sutta)

I have heard that on one occasion the Blessed One was staying near Sāvatthī at Jeta's Grove, Anāthapiṇḍika's monastery. And on that occasion Ven. Sāriputta, Ven. Mahā Moggalāna, Ven. Mahā Kassapa, Ven. Mahā Kaccāna, Ven. Mahā Koṭṭhita, Ven. Mahā Kappina, Ven. Mahā Cunda, Ven. Anuruddha, Ven. Revata, and Ven. Nanda[1] went to the Blessed One. The Blessed One saw them coming from afar and, on seeing them, addressed the monks, "Monks, those are brahmans who are coming. Monks, those are brahmans who are coming."

When this was said, a certain monk who was a brahman by birth said to the Blessed One, "To what extent, lord, is one a brahman? And which are the qualities that make one a brahman?"

Then, on realizing the significance of that, the Blessed One on that occasion exclaimed:

> Having banished evil qualities,[2]
> those who go about ever mindful, > awakened, their fetters ended:
> They, in the world,
> are truly brahmans.

Notes

1. This translation follows the Thai and Burmese versions of this passage. The Sri Lankan version replaces Ven. Nanda in this list with Ven. Ānanda; the PTS version replaces him with Ven. Devadatta and Ven. Ānanda. These latter two readings would appear to be mistaken, as the Buddha in this sutta defines "brahman" as one whose fetters are ended–i.e., an arahant–whereas Ven. Ānanda became an arahant only after the Buddha's passing; Devadatta, after having caused a split in the Saṅgha toward the end of the Buddha's life, fell into hell.

2. This line contains a wordplay on the words brāhmaṇa and bāhita (banished)–the same wordplay used in Dhp 388 and Ud 1:4.

Ud 1:6 Mahā Kassapa (Kassapa Sutta)

I have heard that on one occasion the Blessed One was staying near Rājagaha at the Bamboo Forest, the Squirrels' Sanctuary. And on that occasion Ven. Mahā Kassapa was staying at the Pipphali Cave, afflicted, in pain, & seriously ill. Then, at a later time, he recovered from his illness. When he had recovered from the illness, the thought occurred to him: "What if I were to go into Rājagaha for alms?"

Now on that occasion 500 devatās were in a state of eagerness for the chance to give alms to Ven. Mahā Kassapa. But Ven. Mahā Kassapa, turning down those 500 devatās, early in the morning adjusted his under robe[1] and–carrying his bowl & robes–went into Rājagaha for alms along the streets of the poor, the streets of the indigent, the streets of the weavers. The Blessed One saw that Ven. Mahā Kassapa had gone into Rājagaha for alms along the streets of the poor, the streets of the indigent, the streets of the weavers.

Then, on realizing the significance of that, the Blessed One on that occasion exclaimed:

> Supporting no others, > unknown,[2]
> tamed, established
> in what is essential,
> effluents ended,
> anger disgorged:
> He's what I call
> a brahman.

Notes

1. According to the protocols given in Cv.VIII, a monk leaving a monastery in the wilderness with the purpose of going for alms would wear just his under robe, while carrying his upper and outer robes folded over his shoulder or upper back. On approaching an inhabited area he would stop and make sure that his under robe was neatly arranged: covering the area from above his navel to below his knees, and hanging down evenly in front and behind. Then he would put on his upper and outer robe, arranged so that the upper robe was a lining for the outer robe. If he was wearing sandals, he would take them off and place them in a small cloth bag. Only then would he enter the inhabited area for alms.

2. There is an alliterative play of words here on anaññā (no others) and aññāta (unknown).

Ud 1:7 Aja (Aja Sutta)

I have heard that on one occasion the Blessed One was staying near Pāva at the Ajakalāpaka [Herd-of-Goats] shrine, the dwelling of the Ajakalāpaka spirit. And on that occasion, in the pitch-black darkness of the night, the Blessed One was sitting in the open air, and the rain was falling in scattered drops.

Then the Ajakalāpaka spirit–wanting to cause fear, terror, & horripilation in the Blessed One–went to him and, on arrival, not far from him, three times made a commotion & pandemonium: "Commotion & pandemonium! Commotion & pandemonium! Commotion & pandemonium!–That's a goblin for you, contemplative!"

Then, on realizing the significance of that, the Blessed One on that occasion exclaimed:

> When,
> with regard to his own qualities,[1] > a brahman is one
> who has gone beyond,
> he transcends this goblin > and his pandemonium.

Note

1. Dhammas. This is apparently a reference to skillful and unskillful mental qualities–which would mean that this sutta sides with the passages in the Canon categorizing unbinding not as a dhamma, but as the transcending of all dhammas. (The suttas in general are inconsistent on this point. Iti 90, among others, states clearly that unbinding counts as a dhamma. AN 10:58, on the other hand, calls unbinding the ending of all dhammas. Sn 5:6 calls the attainment of the goal the transcending of all dhammas, just as Sn 4:6 and Sn 4:10 state that the arahant has transcended dispassion, said to be the highest dhamma. MN 22, in the famous simile of the raft, states that all dhammas are abandoned at the end of the path.)

Ud 1:8 Saṅgāmaji (Saṅgāmaji Sutta)

I have heard that on one occasion the Blessed One was staying near Sāvatthī at Jeta's Grove, Anāthapiṇḍika's monastery. And on that occasion Ven. Saṅgāmaji had arrived in Sāvatthī to see the Blessed One. His former wife heard, "Master Saṅgāmaji, they say, has arrived in Sāvatthī." Taking her small child, she went to Jeta's Grove. On that occasion Ven. Saṅgāmaji was sitting at the root of a tree for the day's abiding. His former wife went to him and, on arrival, said to him, "Look after me, contemplative–(a woman) with a little son." When this was said, Ven. Saṅgāmaji remained silent. A second time… A third time, his former wife said to him, "Look after me, contemplative–(a woman) with a little son." A third time, Ven. Saṅgāmaji remained silent.

Then his former wife, taking the baby and leaving him in front of Ven. Saṅgāmaji, went away, saying, "That's your son, contemplative. Look after him."

Then Ven. Saṅgāmaji neither looked at the child nor spoke to him. His wife, after going not far away, was looking back and saw Ven. Saṅgāmaji neither looking at the child nor speaking to him. On seeing this, the thought occurred to her, "The contemplative doesn't even care about his son." Returning from there and taking the child, she left.

The Blessed One–with his divine eye, purified and surpassing the human–saw Ven. Saṅgāmaji's former wife misbehaving in that way.

Then, on realizing the significance of that, the Blessed One on that occasion exclaimed:

> At her coming,
> he didn't delight;
> at her leaving,
> he didn't grieve.
> A victor in battle, freed from the tie:[1]
> He's what I call

a brahman.

Note

1. This line is a double wordplay on Saṅgāmaji's name. Literally, it means a victor in battle–a compound of saṅgāma (battle) and -ji (victor)–but the Buddha also extracts from the first member of the compound the word saṅgā, which means "from the tie." Strictly speaking, saṅgāma and saṅgā are not related to each other. The ability to engage in wordplay using unrelated words like this was considered a sign of intelligence and wit.

Ud 1:9 Ascetics (Jaṭila Sutta)

I have heard that on one occasion the Blessed One was staying near Gayā at Gayā Head. And on that occasion, many ascetics–on the cold winter nights of the "Between-the-Eights,"[1] when the snow was falling in Gayā–jumped up in the water, jumped down in the water, did a jumping-up-&-down in the water, poured (water over themselves), and performed the fire sacrifice, (thinking,) "Through this there is purity."

The Blessed One saw those many ascetics–on the cold winter nights of the "Between-the-Eights," when the snow was falling in Gayā–jumping up in the water, jumping down in the water, doing a jumping-up-&-down in the water, pouring (water over themselves), and performing the fire sacrifice, (thinking,) "Through this there is purity."

Then, on realizing the significance of that, the Blessed One on that occasion exclaimed:

> Not by water is one clean, > though many people are bathing here.
> Whoever has truth
> & rectitude:
>
> He's a clean one;
>
> he, a brahman.[2]

Notes

1. The "Eights" are the waning half-moon days (each on the eighth day of the waning cycle) after three of the full moons in the cold season. These are the dates of brahmanical ceremonies for making merit for the dead. The period between the first and last of these dates–the "Between-the-Eights"–is regarded in northern India as the coldest part of the year. See AN 3:35.

2. The last half of this verse is identical with the last half of Dhp 393.

Ud 1:10 Bāhiya (Bāhiya Sutta)

I have heard that on one occasion the Blessed One was staying near Sāvatthī at Jeta's Grove, Anāthapiṇḍika's monastery. And on that occasion Bāhiya of the Bark-cloth was living in Suppāraka by the seashore. He was worshipped, revered, honored, venerated, and given homage–a recipient of robes, alms food, lodgings, & medicinal requisites for the sick. Then, when he was alone in seclusion, this line of thinking appeared to his awareness: "Now, of those who in this world are arahants or have entered the path of arahantship, am I one?"

Then a devatā who had once been a blood relative of Bāhiya of the Bark-cloth–compassionate, desiring his welfare, knowing with her own awareness the line of thinking that had arisen in his awareness–went to him and on arrival said to him, "You, Bāhiya, are neither an arahant nor have you entered the path of arahantship. You don't even have the practice whereby you would become an arahant or enter the path of arahantship."

"Then who, in this world with its devas, are arahants or have entered the path to arahantship?"

"Bāhiya, there is a city in the northern country named Sāvatthī. There the Blessed One–an arahant, rightly self-awakened–is living now. He truly is an arahant and teaches the Dhamma leading to arahantship."

Then Bāhiya, deeply chastened by the devatā, left Suppāraka right then and, in the space of one night,[1] went all the way to where the Blessed One was staying near Sāvatthī at Jeta's Grove, Anāthapiṇḍika's monastery. Now on that occasion, a large number of monks were doing walking meditation in the open air. He went to them and, on arrival, said, "Where, venerable sirs, is the Blessed One–the arahant, rightly self-awakened–now staying? We want to see that Blessed One–the arahant, rightly self-awakened."

"The Blessed One has gone into town for alms."

Then Bāhiya, hurriedly leaving Jeta's Grove and entering Sāvatthī, saw the Blessed One going for alms in Sāvatthī–serene & inspiring serene confidence, calming, his senses at peace, his mind at peace, having attained the utmost tranquility & poise, tamed, guarded, his senses restrained, a Great One (nāga). Seeing him, he approached the Blessed One and, on reaching him, threw himself down, with his head at the Blessed One's feet, and said, "Teach me the Dhamma, O Blessed One! Teach me the Dhamma, O One-Well-Gone, that will be for my long-term welfare & bliss."

When this was said, the Blessed One said to him, "This is not the time, Bāhiya. We have entered the town for alms."

A second time, Bāhiya said to the Blessed One, "But it is hard to know for sure what dangers there may be for the Blessed One's life, or what dangers there may be for mine. Teach me the Dhamma, O Blessed One! Teach me the Dhamma, O One-Well-Gone, that will be for my long-term welfare & bliss."

A second time, the Blessed One said to him, "This is not the time, Bāhiya. We have entered the town for alms."

A third time, Bāhiya said to the Blessed One, "But it is hard to know for sure what dangers there may be for the Blessed One's life, or what dangers there may be for mine. Teach me the Dhamma, O Blessed One! Teach me the Dhamma, O One-Well-Gone, that will be for my long-term welfare & bliss."

"Then, Bāhiya, you should train yourself thus: In reference to the seen, there will be only the seen. In reference to the heard, only the heard. In reference to the sensed, only the sensed. In reference to the cognized, only the cognized. That is how you should train yourself. When for you there will be only the seen in reference to the seen, only the heard in reference to the heard, only the sensed in reference to the sensed, only the cognized in reference to the cognized, then, Bāhiya, there is no you in connection with that. When there is no you in connection with that, there is no you there. When there is no you there, you are neither here nor yonder nor between the two. This, just this, is the end of stress."[2]

Through hearing this brief explanation of the Dhamma from the Blessed One, the mind of Bāhiya of the Bark-cloth right then and there was released from effluents through lack of clinging/sustenance. Having exhorted Bāhiya of the Bark-cloth with this brief explanation of the Dhamma, the Blessed One left.

Now, not long after the Blessed One's departure, Bāhiya was attacked & killed by a cow with a young calf. Then the Blessed One, having gone for alms in Sāvatthī, after the meal, returning from his alms round with a large number of monks, saw that Bāhiya had died. On seeing him, he said to the monks, "Take Bāhiya's body, monks, and, placing it on a litter and carrying it away, cremate it and build him a memorial. Your companion in the holy life has died."

Responding, "As you say, lord," to the Blessed One, the monks–placing Bāhiya's body on a litter, carrying it away, cremating it, and building him a memorial–went to the Blessed One. On arrival, having bowed down to him, sat to one side. As they were sitting there, they said to him, "Bāhiya's body has been cremated, lord, and his memorial has been built. What is his destination? What is his future state?"

"Monks, Bāhiya of the Bark-cloth was wise. He practiced the Dhamma in accordance with the Dhamma and did not pester me with issues related to the Dhamma. Bāhiya of the Bark-cloth, monks, is totally unbound."

Then, on realizing the significance of that, the Blessed One on that occasion exclaimed:

> Where water, earth,
> fire, & wind
> have no footing:
> There the stars don't shine,
> the sun isn't visible.
> There the moon doesn't appear.
> There darkness is not found.
> And when a sage,
> a brahman through sagacity, > has realized [this] for himself, > then from form & formless,
> from bliss & pain,
> he is freed.

Notes

1. Eka-ratti-parivāsena: This phrase can also mean, "taking one-night sojourns" (i.e., resting no more than one night in any one spot); or "with a one-night sojourn." The Commentary prefers the meaning used in the translation, noting that the distance between Suppāraka and Sāvatthī amounts to 120 leagues, or approximately 1,200 miles. In its version of Bāhiya's story, Bāhiya had no meditative attainments at all, and so the miraculous speed of his journey had to be attributed either to the power of the deva or the power of the Buddha. However, he may actually have had strong powers of concentration with some attendant psychic powers of his own.

2. For a discussion of these instructions, see the article, "Food for Awakening: The Role of Appropriate Attention."

2 : Muccalinda

Ud 2:1 Muccalinda (Muccalinda Sutta)

I have heard that on one occasion, the Blessed One was staying at Uruvelā on the bank of the Nerañjarā River at the root of the Muccalinda tree, newly awakened. And on that occasion he sat for seven days in one session, sensitive to the bliss of release.

And on that occasion a great, out-of-season storm-cloud rose up, with seven days of rainy weather, cold winds, & intense darkness. Then Muccalinda the nāga king–leaving his dwelling place and encircling the Blessed One's body seven times with his coils–stood with his great hood spread over the Blessed One, (thinking,) "Don't let the Blessed One be disturbed by cold. Don't let the Blessed One be disturbed by heat. Don't let the Blessed One be disturbed by the touch of flies, mosquitoes, wind, sun, & creeping things."

Then, with the passing of seven days, the Blessed One emerged from that concentration. Muccalinda the nāga king, realizing that the sky had cleared and was free of clouds, unraveled his coils from the body of the Blessed One, dropped his own appearance and, assuming the appearance of a young man, stood in front of the Blessed One with hands before his heart, paying homage.

Then, on realizing the significance of that, the Blessed One on that occasion exclaimed:

> Blissful is solitude
> for one who's content, > who has heard the Dhamma, > who sees.
> Blissful is non-affliction
> with regard for the world, restraint for living beings.

Blissful is dispassion
with regard for the world,
the overcoming of sensuality.
But the subduing of the conceit "I am"[1]–
That is truly
the ultimate bliss.

Note

1. See Ud 1:1, note 3.

Ud 2:2 Kings (Rājā Sutta)

I have heard that on one occasion the Blessed One was staying near Sāvatthī at Jeta's Grove, Anāthapiṇḍika's monastery. And on that occasion a large number of monks, after the meal, on returning from their alms round, were sitting gathered together in the assembly hall when this discussion arose: "Friends, which of these two kings has greater wealth, greater possessions, the greater treasury, the larger realm, the greater stock of riding animals, the greater army, greater power, greater might: King Seniya Bimbisāra of Magadha or King Pasenadi of Kosala?" And this discussion came to no conclusion.

Then the Blessed One, emerging from his seclusion in the late afternoon, went to the assembly hall and, on arrival, sat down on a seat laid out. Seated, he addressed the monks: "For what topic are you sitting together here? And what was the discussion that came to no conclusion?"

"Just now, lord, after the meal, on returning from our alms round, we were sitting gathered here at the assembly hall when this discussion arose: 'Friends, which of these two kings has greater wealth, greater possessions, the greater treasury, the larger realm, the greater stock of riding animals, the greater army, greater power, greater might: King Seniya Bimbisāra of Magadha or King Pasenadi of Kosala?' This was the discussion that had come to no conclusion when the Blessed One arrived."

"It isn't proper, monks, that sons of good families, on having gone forth out of faith from home to the homeless life, should talk on such a topic. When you have gathered you have two duties: either Dhamma-talk or noble silence."[1]

Then, on realizing the significance of that, the Blessed One on that occasion exclaimed:

> Any sensual bliss in the world,
> any heavenly bliss,
> isn't worth one sixteenth-sixteenth of the bliss of the ending of craving.

Note

1. SN 21:1 equates noble silence with the second jhāna. This apparently relates to the fact that directed thought and evaluation, which MN 44 identifies as verbal fabrications, are abandoned when going from the first jhāna into the second.

Ud 2:3 The Stick (Daṇḍa Sutta)

I have heard that on one occasion the Blessed One was staying near Sāvatthī at Jeta's Grove, Anāthapiṇḍika's monastery. And on that occasion, a large number of boys on the road between Sāvatthī & Jeta's Grove were hitting a snake with a stick. Then early in the morning the Blessed One adjusted his under robe and–carrying his bowl & robes–went into Sāvatthī for alms. He saw the large number of boys on the road between Sāvatthī & Jeta's Grove hitting the snake with a stick.

Then, on realizing the significance of that, the Blessed One on that occasion exclaimed:

> Whoever hits with a stick > beings desiring ease,
> when he himself is looking for ease,
> will meet with no ease after death.
>
> Whoever doesn't hit with a stick
> beings desiring ease,
> when he himself is looking for ease,
> will meet with ease after death.[1]

Ud 2:4 Veneration (Sakkāra Sutta)

I have heard that on one occasion the Blessed One was staying near Sāvatthī at Jeta's Grove, Anāthapiṇḍika's monastery. And on that occasion the Blessed One was worshipped, revered, honored, venerated, and given homage–a recipient of robes, alms food, lodgings, & medicinal requisites for the sick. The community of monks was also worshipped, revered, honored, venerated, and given homage–a recipient of robes, alms food, lodgings, & medicinal requisites for the sick. But the wanderers of other sects were not worshipped, revered, honored, venerated, or given homage; nor were they recipients of robes, alms food, lodgings, or medicinal requisites for the sick. So the wanderers of other sects, unable to stand the veneration given to the Blessed One and the community of monks, on seeing monks in village or wilderness, would insult, revile, irritate, & harass them with discourteous, abusive language.

Then a large number of monks went to the Blessed One and, on arrival, having bowed down to him, sat to one side. As they were sitting there, they said to him, "At present the Blessed One is worshipped, revered, honored, venerated, and given homage–a recipient of robes, alms food, lodgings, & medicinal requisites for the sick. The community of monks is also worshipped, revered, honored, venerated, and given homage–a recipient of robes, alms food, lodgings, & medicinal requisites for the sick. But the wanderers of other sects are not worshipped, revered, honored, venerated, or given homage; nor are they recipients of robes, alms food, lodgings, or medicinal requisites for the sick. So the wanderers of other sects, unable to stand the veneration given to the Blessed One and the community of monks, on seeing monks in village or wilderness, insult, revile, irritate, & harass them with discourteous, abusive language."

Then, on realizing the significance of that, the Blessed One on that occasion exclaimed:

When in contact with pleasure or pain in village or wilderness, don't take it as yours or as others.' Contacts make contact dependent on a sense of acquisition.

Where there's no sense of acquisition, contacts would make contact with what?

Ud 2:5 The Lay Follower (Upāsaka Sutta)

I have heard that on one occasion the Blessed One was staying near Sāvatthī at Jeta's Grove, Anāthapiṇḍika's monastery. And on that occasion a certain lay follower from Icchānaṅgalaka had arrived in Sāvatthī on some business affairs. Having settled his affairs in Sāvatthī, he went to the Blessed One and, on arrival, having bowed down to him, sat to one side. As he was sitting there, the Blessed One said to him, "At long last you have managed to come here."

"For a long time, lord, have I wanted to come see the Blessed One, but being involved in one business affair after another, I have not been able to do so."

Then, on realizing the significance of that, the Blessed One on that occasion exclaimed:

> How blissful it is, for one who has nothing,
> who has mastered the Dhamma, > is learned.
> See him suffering, one who has something,
> a person bound in body
> with people.

Ud 2:6 The Pregnant Woman (Gabbhinin Sutta)

I have heard that on one occasion the Blessed One was staying near Sāvatthī at Jeta's Grove, Anāthapiṇḍika's monastery. And on that occasion the young wife of a certain wanderer was pregnant and on the verge of delivery. So she said to the wanderer, "Go, brahman, get some oil for my delivery."

When this was said, the wanderer said to her, "But where can I get any oil?"

A second time, she said to him, "Go, brahman, get some oil for my delivery."

A second time, he said to her, "But where can I get any oil?"

A third time, she said to him, "Go, brahman get some oil for my delivery."

Now on that occasion at the storehouse of King Pasenadi Kosala contemplatives & brahmans were being given as much oil or ghee as they needed to drink, but not to take away. So the thought occurred to the wanderer, "At present at the storehouse of King Pasenadi Kosala contemplatives & brahmans are being given as much oil or ghee as they need to drink, but not to take away. Suppose, having gone there, I were to drink as much oil as I need and, on returning home, vomiting it up, were to give it to use at this delivery?"

So, having gone to the storehouse of King Pasenadi Kosala, he drank as much oil as he needed but, on returning home, was unable to bring it up or pass it down. So he rolled back & forth, suffering from fierce pains, sharp & severe. Then early in the morning the Blessed One adjusted his under robe and–carrying his bowl & robes–went into Sāvatthī for alms. He saw the wanderer rolling back & forth, suffering from fierce pains, sharp & severe.

Then, on realizing the significance of that, the Blessed One on that occasion exclaimed:

How blissful it is, for one who has nothing.
Attainers-of-wisdom
are people with nothing.
See him suffering, one who has something,
a person bound in mind
with people.

Ud 2:7 The Only Son (Ekaputta Sutta)

I have heard that on one occasion the Blessed One was staying near Sāvatthī at Jeta's Grove, Anāthapiṇḍika's monastery. And on that occasion the dear and beloved only son of a certain lay follower had died. So a large number of lay followers–their clothes wet, their hair wet–went to the Blessed One in the middle of the day and, on arrival, having bowed down to him, sat to one side. As they were sitting there the Blessed One said to them: "Why have you come here–your clothes wet, your hair wet–in the middle of the day?"

When this was said, the lay follower said to the Blessed One, "My dear and beloved only son, lord, has died. This is why we have come here–our clothes wet, our hair wet–in the middle of the day."

Then, on realizing the significance of that, the Blessed One on that occasion exclaimed:

> Tied down by the allure > of what seems dear,[1] > hosts of devas, most human beings, > worn out with misery, > fall under the sway
> of the King of Death.
> But those who, day & night, > heedfully abandon > what seems dear,
> dig up misery
> by the root– > Death's bait
> so hard
> to overcome.

Ud 2:8 Suppavāsā (Suppavāsā Sutta)

I have heard that on one occasion the Blessed One was staying near Kuṇḍiya in the Kuṇḍiṭṭhāna forest. And on that occasion Suppavāsā the Koliyan-daughter had been seven years pregnant and seven days in difficult labor. She–touched by fierce, sharp pains–endured them with three thoughts: "How rightly self-awakened is the Blessed One who, abandoning this sort of suffering, teaches the Dhamma! How well-practiced is the community of the Blessed One's disciples who practice, abandoning this sort of suffering! How truly blissful is unbinding, where this sort of pain is not found!"

Then Suppavāsā said to her husband, "Come, young master. Go to the Blessed One and, on arrival, showing reverence with your head to his feet in my name, ask whether he is free from illness & affliction, is carefree, strong, & living in comfort, saying: 'Suppavāsā the Koliyan-daughter, lord, shows reverence with her head to your feet and asks whether you are free from illness & affliction, are carefree, strong, & living in comfort.' And say this: 'Suppavāsā has been seven years pregnant and seven days in difficult labor. She–touched by fierce, sharp pains–endures them with three thoughts: "How rightly self-awakened is the Blessed One who, abandoning this sort of suffering, teaches the Dhamma! How well-practiced is the community of the Blessed One's disciples who practice, abandoning this sort of suffering! How truly blissful is unbinding, where this sort of pain is not found!"'"

Responding, "Excellent!" to Suppavāsā the Koliyan-daughter, the Koliyan-son went to the Blessed One and, on arrival, having bowed down to the Blessed One, sat to one side. As he was sitting there he said to the Blessed One, "Suppavāsā the Koliyan-daughter, lord, shows reverence with her head to your feet and asks whether you are free from illness & affliction, are carefree, strong, & living in comfort. And she says this: 'Suppavāsā has been seven years pregnant and seven days in difficult labor. She–touched by fierce, sharp pains–endures them with three thoughts:

"How rightly self-awakened is the Blessed One who, abandoning this sort of suffering, teaches the Dhamma! How well-practiced is the community of the Blessed One's disciples who practice, abandoning this sort of suffering! How truly blissful is unbinding, where this sort of pain is not found!""

[The Blessed One said:] "May Suppavāsā the Koliyan-daughter be well & free from disease. And may she deliver a son free from disease." And at the same time as the Blessed One's statement, Suppavāsā the Koliyan-daughter–well & free from disease–delivered a son free from disease.

Saying, "Very well, lord," the Koliyan-son, delighting in & approving of the Blessed One's words, got up from his seat, bowed down to the Blessed One and–circling him to the right–returned to his home. He saw that Suppavāsā the Koliyan-daughter–well & free from disease–had delivered a son free from disease. On seeing this, the thought occurred to him, "How amazing! How astounding!–the Tathāgata's great power, great might, in that, at the same time as the Blessed One's statement, Suppavāsā the Koliyan-daughter–well & free from disease–would deliver a son free from disease!" Gratified, he was joyful, rapturous, & happy.

Then Suppavāsā said to her husband, "Come, young master. Go to the Blessed One and, on arrival, showing reverence with your head to his feet in my name, saying: 'Suppavāsā the Koliyan-daughter, lord, shows reverence with her head to your feet.' And say this: 'Suppavāsā, who was seven years pregnant and seven days in difficult labor, has now–well & free from disease–delivered a son free from disease. She invites the community of monks, with the Buddha at its head, for seven days of meals. May the Blessed One acquiesce to Suppavāsā's seven meals, together with the community of monks.'"

Responding, "Excellent!" to Suppavāsā the Koliyan-daughter, the Koliyan-son went to the Blessed One and, on arrival, having bowed down to the Blessed One, sat to one side. As he was sitting there he said to the Blessed One, "Suppavāsā the Koliyan-daughter, lord, shows reverence with her head to your feet. And she says this: 'Suppavāsā, who was seven years pregnant and seven days in difficult labor, has now–well & free from disease–delivered a son free from disease. She invites the community of monks, with the Buddha at its head, for seven days of meals. May the Blessed One acquiesce to Suppavāsā's seven meals, together with the community of monks.'"

Now at that time a certain lay follower had invited the community of monks, with the Buddha at its head, for the next day's meal. That lay follower was a supporter of Ven. Mahā Moggallāna. So the Blessed One addressed Ven. Mahā Moggallāna, "Come, Moggallāna. Go to the lay follower and, on arrival, say to him, 'Suppavāsā the Koliyan-daughter, who was seven years pregnant and seven days in difficult labor, has now–well & free from disease–delivered a son free from disease. She has invited the community of monks, with the Buddha at its head, for seven days of meals. Let Suppavāsā do seven meals. Afterward, you will do yours.' He's your supporter."

Responding, "As you say, lord," to the Blessed One, Ven. Moggallāna went to the lay follower and, on arrival, said to him, "Suppavāsā the Koliyan-daughter, who was seven years pregnant and seven days in difficult labor, has now–well & free from disease–delivered a son free from disease. She has invited the community of monks, with the Buddha at its head, for seven days of meals. Let Suppavāsā do seven meals; afterward, you will do yours."

"Venerable sir, if Ven. Moggallāna will be my guarantor for three things–(my) wealth, life, & faith–then let Suppavāsā do seven meals; afterward, I will do mine."

"For two things, friend, will I be your guarantor: your wealth & life. Only you are the guarantor of your faith."

"Venerable sir, if Ven. Moggallāna will be my guarantor for two things–(my) wealth & life–then let Suppavāsā do seven meals; afterward, I will do mine."

Then Ven. Moggallāna, having conciliated the lay follower, went to the Blessed One and, on arrival, said, "The lay follower, lord, has been conciliated. Let Suppavāsā do seven meals; afterward, he will do his."

So for seven days Suppavāsā the Koliyan-daughter with her own hand served & satisfied the community of monks, with the Buddha at its head, with exquisite staple & non-staple food. And she had the child show reverence to the Blessed One and the community of monks. Then Ven.

Sāriputta said to the child, "I trust, child, that things are bearable for you. I trust that things are comfortable for you. I trust that there's no pain."

"From where, Ven. Sāriputta, would things be bearable for me? From where would they be comfortable for me living seven years in a belly of blood?"[1]

Then Suppavāsā–(thinking,) "My son is conversing with the Dhamma General!"–was gratified, joyful, rapturous, & happy.

The Blessed One, knowing that Suppavāsā was gratified, joyful, rapturous, & happy, said to her, "Suppavāsā, would you like to have another son like this?"

"Lord Blessed One[2], I would like to have seven more sons like this!"

Then, on realizing the significance of that, the Blessed One on that occasion exclaimed:

> The disagreeable
> in the guise of the agreeable, > the unlovable
> in the guise of the lovable, > pain in the guise of bliss, > overcome
> one who is heedless.

Notes

1. Reading lohita-kucchiyā with the Thai edition. The Commentary favors the reading, lohita-kumbhiyā, in a pot of blood. The Commentary states that Suppavāsā's son later became the famous arahant, Sīvalin, whom the Buddha declared to be foremost among his disciples in receiving gifts.

2. Reading bhante Bhagavā with the Thai edition. This extreme way of addressing the Buddha also occurs in Ud 8:7. The Sri Lankan and Burmese editions here read simply Bhagavā.

Ud 2:9 Visākhā (Visākhā Sutta)

I have heard that on one occasion the Blessed One was staying near Sāvatthī at the Eastern Monastery, the palace of Migāra's mother.[1] And on that occasion, Visākhā, Migāra's mother, had some dealings with King Pasenadi Kosala that he did not settle as she had wished. So in the middle of the day she went to the Blessed One and, on arrival, having bowed down to him, sat to one side. As she was sitting there the Blessed One said to her, "Well now, Visākhā, where are you coming from in the middle of the day?"

"Just now, lord, I had some dealings with King Pasenadi Kosala that he did not settle as I had wished."

Then, on realizing the significance of that, the Blessed One on that occasion exclaimed:

> All subjection to others > is painful.
> All independence
> is bliss.
> What is held in common > brings suffering, > for duties are hard
> to overcome.

Note

1. According to the Commentary, Visākhā was actually Migāra's daughter, but because she introduced him to the Dhamma, she gained the epithet of being his mother.

Ud 2:10 Bhaddiya Kāḷigodha (Kāḷigodha Sutta)

I have heard that on one occasion the Blessed One was staying near Anupiyā in the Mango Grove. And on that occasion, Ven. Bhaddiya, Kāḷigodhā's son, on going to the wilderness, to the root of a tree, or to an empty dwelling, would repeatedly exclaim, "What bliss! What bliss!"

A large number of monks heard Ven. Bhaddiya, Kāḷigodhā's son, on going to the wilderness, to the root of a tree, or to an empty dwelling, repeatedly exclaim, "What bliss! What bliss!" and on hearing him, the thought occurred to them, "There's no doubt but that Ven. Bhaddiya, Kāḷigodhā's son, doesn't enjoy leading the holy life, for when he was a householder he knew the bliss of kingship, so that now, on recollecting that when going to the wilderness, to the root of a tree, or to an empty dwelling, he is repeatedly exclaiming, 'What bliss! What bliss!'"

So they went to the Blessed One and, on arrival, having bowed down to him, sat to one side. As they were sitting there, they told him, "Ven. Bhaddiya, Kāḷigodhā's son, lord, on going to the wilderness, to the root of a tree, or to an empty dwelling, repeatedly exclaims, 'What bliss! What bliss!' There's no doubt but that Ven. Bhaddiya doesn't enjoy leading the holy life, for when he was a householder he knew the bliss of kingship, so that now, on recollecting that when going to the wilderness, to the root of a tree, or to an empty dwelling, he is repeatedly exclaiming, 'What bliss! What bliss!'"

Then the Blessed One told a certain monk, "Come, monk. In my name, call Bhaddiya, saying, 'The Teacher calls you, friend Bhaddiya.'"

Responding, "As you say, lord," to the Blessed One, the monk went to Ven. Bhaddiya, Kāḷigodhā's son, and on arrival he said to him, "The Teacher calls you, friend Bhaddiya."

Responding, "As you say, my friend," to the monk, Ven. Bhaddiya, Kāḷigodhā's son, went to the Blessed One and, on arrival, having bowed down to him, sat to one side. As he was sitting there, the Blessed One said to him, "Is it true, Bhaddiya that–on going to the wilderness, to the root of a tree, or to an empty dwelling–you repeatedly exclaim, 'What bliss! What bliss!'?"

"Yes, lord."

"What compelling reason do you have in mind that–when going to the wilderness, to the root of a tree, or to an empty dwelling–you repeatedly exclaim, 'What bliss! What bliss!'?"

"Before, when I has a householder, maintaining the bliss of kingship,[1] lord, I had guards posted within and without the royal apartments, within and without the city, within and without the countryside. But even though I was thus guarded, thus protected, I dwelled in fear–agitated, distrustful, & afraid. But now, on going alone to the wilderness, to the root of a tree, or to an empty dwelling, I dwell without fear, unagitated, confident, & unafraid–unconcerned, unruffled, living on the gifts of others, with my mind like a wild deer. This is the compelling reason I have in mind that–when going to the wilderness, to the root of a tree, or to an empty dwelling–I repeatedly exclaim, 'What bliss! What bliss!'"

Then, on realizing the significance of that, the Blessed One on that occasion exclaimed:

> From whose heart
> there is no provocation, > & for whom becoming & non-becoming > are overcome,
> he–
> beyond fear,
> blissful,
> with no grief–
> is one the devas can't see.

3 : Nanda

Ud 3:1 Kamma (Kamma Sutta)

I have heard that on one occasion the Blessed One was staying near Sāvatthī at Jeta's Grove, Anāthapiṇḍika's monastery. And on that occasion a certain monk was sitting not far from the Blessed One, his legs crossed, his body held erect, enduring fierce pains, sharp & severe, that were the result of old kamma–mindful, alert, without suffering. The Blessed One saw him sitting not far away, his legs crossed, his body held erect, enduring fierce pains, sharp & severe, that were the result of old kamma–mindful, alert, and not struck down by them.

Then, on realizing the significance of that, the Blessed One on that occasion exclaimed:

> For the monk who has left > all kamma
> behind,
> shaking off the dust of the past,
> steady, unpossessive,
> Such:[1]
> There's no point in telling > anyone else.

Note

1. Such (tādin): An adjective applied to the mind of one who has attained the goal. It indicates that the mind "is what it is"–indescribable but not subject to change or alteration.

Ud 3:2 Nanda (Nanda Sutta)

I have heard that on one occasion the Blessed One was staying near Sāvatthī at Jeta's Grove, Anāthapiṇḍika's monastery. And on that occasion Ven. Nanda–the Blessed One's brother, son of his maternal aunt–announced to a large number of monks: "I don't enjoy leading the holy life, my friends. I can't keep up the holy life. Giving up the training, I will return to the common life."

Then a certain monk went to the Blessed One and, on arrival, having bowed down to him, sat to one side. As he was sitting there, he told the Blessed One: "Lord, Ven. Nanda–the Blessed One's brother, son of his maternal aunt–has announced to a large number of monks: 'I don't enjoy leading the holy life, my friends. I can't keep up the holy life. Giving up the training, I will return to the common life.'"

Then the Blessed One told a certain monk, "Come, monk. In my name, call Nanda, saying, 'The Teacher calls you, friend Nanda.'"

Responding, "As you say, lord," to the Blessed One, the monk went to Ven. Nanda, on arrival he said, "The Teacher calls you, friend Nanda."

Responding, "As you say, my friend," to the monk, Ven. Nanda went to the Blessed One and, on arrival, having bowed down to him, sat to one side. As he was sitting there, the Blessed One said to him, "Is it true, Nanda, that you have announced to a large number of monks: 'I don't enjoy leading the holy life, my friends. I can't keep up the holy life. Giving up the training, I will return to the common life'?"

"Yes, lord."

"But why, Nanda, don't you enjoy leading the holy life? Why can't you keep up the holy life? Why, giving up the training, will you return to the common life?"

"Lord, as I was leaving home, a Sakyan girl–the envy of the countryside–glanced up at me, with her hair half-combed, and said, 'Hurry back, master.' Recollecting that, I don't enjoy leading the holy life. I can't keep up the holy life. Giving up the training, I will return to the common life."

Then, taking Ven. Nanda by the arm–as a strong man might flex his extended arm or extend his flexed arm–the Blessed One disappeared from Jeta's Grove and reappeared among the Devas of the Heaven of the Thirty-three [Tāvatiṁsa]. Now on that occasion about 500 dove-footed nymphs had come to wait upon Sakka, the ruler of the devas. The Blessed One said to Ven. Nanda, "Nanda, do you see these 500 dove-footed nymphs?"

"Yes, lord."

"What do you think, Nanda? Which is lovelier, better looking, more charming: the Sakyan girl, the envy of the countryside, or these 500 dove-footed nymphs?"

"Lord, compared to these 500 dove-footed nymphs, the Sakyan girl, the envy of the countryside, is like a cauterized monkey with its ears & nose cut off. She doesn't count. She's not even a small fraction. There's no comparison. The 500 dove-footed nymphs are lovelier, better looking, more charming."

"Then take joy, Nanda. Take joy! I am your guarantor for getting 500 dove-footed nymphs."

"If the Blessed One is my guarantor for getting 500 dove-footed nymphs, I will enjoy leading the holy life under the Blessed One."

Then, taking Ven. Nanda by the arm–as a strong man might flex his extended arm or extend his flexed arm–the Blessed One disappeared from among the Devas of the Heaven of the Thirty-three and reappeared at Jeta's Grove. The monks heard, "They say that Ven. Nanda–the Blessed One's brother, son of his maternal aunt–is leading the holy life for the sake of nymphs. They say that the Blessed One is his guarantor for getting 500 dove-footed nymphs."

Then the monks who were companions of Ven. Nanda went around addressing him as they would a hired hand & a person who had been bought: "Venerable Nanda, they say, has been hired. Venerable Nanda, they say, has been bought.[1] He's leading the holy life for the sake of nymphs. The Blessed One is his guarantor for getting 500 dove-footed nymphs."

Then Ven. Nanda–humiliated, ashamed, & disgusted that the monks who were his companions were addressing him as they would a hired hand & a person who had been bought–went to dwell alone, secluded, heedful, ardent, & resolute. He in no long time entered & remained in the supreme goal of the holy life for which clansmen rightly go forth from home into homelessness, knowing & realizing it for himself right in the here-&-now. He knew, "Birth is ended, the holy life fulfilled, the task done. There is nothing further for the sake of this world." And thus Ven. Nanda became another one of the arahants.

Then a certain devatā, in the far extreme of the night, her extreme radiance lighting up the entirety of Jeta's Grove, approached the Blessed One. On arrival, having bowed down to him, she stood to one side. As she was standing there, she said to the Blessed One, "Lord, Ven. Nanda–the Blessed One's brother, son of his maternal aunt–through the ending of the effluents, has entered & remains in the effluent-free awareness-release & discernment-release, directly knowing & realizing them for himself right in the here-&-now." And within the Blessed One, the knowledge arose: "Nanda, through the ending of the effluents, has entered & remains in the effluent-free awareness-release & discernment-release, directly knowing & realizing them for himself right in the here-&-now."

Then, when the night had passed, Ven. Nanda went to the Blessed One and, on arrival, having bowed down to him, sat to one side. As he was sitting there, he said to the Blessed One, "Lord, about the Blessed One's being my guarantor for getting 500 dove-footed nymphs: I hereby release the Blessed One from that promise."

"Nanda, having comprehended your awareness with my own awareness, I realized that 'Nanda, through the ending of the effluents, has entered & remains in the effluent-free awareness-release & discernment-release, directly knowing & realizing them for himself right in the here-&-now.' And a devatā informed me that 'Ven. Nanda, through the ending of the effluents, has entered & remains in the effluent-free awareness-release & discernment-release, directly knowing & realizing them for himself right in the here-&-now.' When your mind, through lack of clinging, was released from the effluents, I was thereby released from that promise."

Then, on realizing the significance of that, the Blessed One on that occasion exclaimed:

In whom
the mire of sensuality is crossed over,[2]
the thorn of sensuality crushed, the ending of delusion reached:
He doesn't quiver
from pleasures & pains
: a monk.

Notes

1. The monks here address Ven. Nanda as "āyasmant." According to DN 16, they did not normally address one another in this formal way while the Buddha was still alive. Thus there is an element of sarcasm in the way they use the term here.

2. Reading yassa tiṇṇo kāmapaṅko with the Thai edition. The Burmese, Sri Lankan, and PTS editions read, yassa nittiṇṇo paṅko: "In whom the mire is crossed over." The parallel passage in the Udānavarga (32.2) essentially agrees with this latter version.

Ud 3:3 Yasoja (Yasoja Sutta)

I have heard that on one occasion the Blessed One was staying near Sāvatthī at Jeta's Grove, Anāthapiṇḍika's monastery. And on that occasion approximately 500 monks, headed by Ven. Yasoja, had arrived in Sāvatthī to see the Blessed One. As these visiting monks were exchanging greetings with the resident monks, setting their lodgings in order, and putting away their robes & bowls, they made a loud racket, a great racket. Then the Blessed One said to Ven. Ānanda, "Ānanda, what is that loud racket, that great racket like fishermen with a catch of fish?"

"Lord, those are approximately 500 monks, headed by Ven. Yasoja, who have arrived in Sāvatthī to see the Blessed One. As these visiting monks are exchanging greetings with the resident monks, setting their lodgings in order, and putting away their robes & bowls, they are making a loud racket, a great racket."

"In that case, Ānanda, tell those monks in my name, 'The Teacher calls you, friends.'"

Responding, "As you say, lord," to the Blessed One, Ven. Ānanda went to the monks and said, "The Teacher calls you, friends."

Responding, "As you say, friend," to Ven. Ānanda, the monks went to the Blessed One and, on arrival, having bowed down to him, sat to one side. As they were sitting there, the Blessed One said to them, "Monks, why were you making that loud racket, that great racket, like fishermen with a catch of fish?"

When this was said, Ven. Yasoja said to the Blessed One, "Lord, these 500 monks have arrived in Sāvatthī to see the Blessed One. As they were exchanging greetings with the resident monks, setting their lodgings in order, and putting away their robes & bowls, they made a loud racket, a great racket."

"Go away, monks. I dismiss you. You are not to stay in my vicinity."

Responding, "As you say, lord," to the Blessed One, the monks got up from their seats, bowed down to the Blessed One, and left, circling him to the right. Setting their lodgings in order and taking their robes & bowls, they went wandering among the Vajjians. After wandering by stages among the Vajjians, they came to the River Vaggamudā. There on the bank of the River Vaggamudā they made leaf-huts and entered the Rains Retreat.

Then Ven. Yasoja addressed the monks as they entered the Rains Retreat: "Friends, the Blessed One dismissed us, wishing for our benefit, seeking our wellbeing, being sympathetic, and acting out of sympathy. Let's live in such a way that the Blessed One will be gratified by our way of living."

"As you say, friend," the monks responded to Ven. Yasoja. And so, living secluded, ardent, & resolute, every one of them realized the Three Knowledges [remembrance of past lives, knowledge of the arising & passing away of living beings, and knowledge of the ending of mental effluents] in the course of that very Rains Retreat.

Then the Blessed One, having stayed as long as he liked in Sāvatthī, went wandering in the direction of Vesālī. After wandering by stages, he arrived in Vesālī and stayed there in the Gabled Pavilion in the Great Forest. Then, encompassing with his awareness the awareness of the monks staying on the bank of the River Vaggamudā, he said to Ven. Ānanda, "This direction seems bright to me, Ānanda. This direction seems dazzling to me. It's not at all repugnant for me to go & pay attention to where the monks on the bank of the River Vaggamudā are staying. Send a messenger into their presence to say, 'The Teacher calls you, friends. The Teacher wants to see you.'"

Responding, "As you say, lord," to the Blessed One, Ven. Ānanda went to a certain monk and said, "Come now, friend. Go to the monks on the bank of the River Vaggamudā and say to them, 'The Teacher calls you, friends. The Teacher wants to see you.'"

Responding, "As you say, friend," to Ven. Ānanda, the monk–just as a strong man might extend his flexed arm or flex his extended arm–disappeared from the Gabled Pavilion in the Great Forest and appeared in front of the monks on the bank of the River Vaggamudā. Then he said to them, "The Teacher calls you, friends. The Teacher wants to see you."

Responding, "As you say, friend," to the monk, the monks set their lodgings in order and, taking their robes & bowls, disappeared from the bank of the River Vaggamudā–just as a strong man might extend his flexed arm or flex his extended arm–and appeared in the presence of the Blessed One in the Gabled Pavilion in the Great Forest.

Now, at that time the Blessed One was sitting in imperturbable concentration [either in the fourth jhāna, the dimension of the infinitude of space, or the dimension of the infinitude of consciousness]. The thought occurred to the monks, "Now, in which mental dwelling is the Blessed One now residing?" Then they realized, "He is residing in the imperturbable dwelling." So they all sat in imperturbable concentration.

Then Ven. Ānanda–when the night was far advanced, at the end of the first watch–got up from his seat, arranged his robe over one shoulder, stood facing the Blessed One, paying homage with his hands placed palm-to-palm over his heart, and said to him, "The night, lord, is far advanced. The first watch has ended. The visiting monks have been sitting here a long time. May the Blessed One greet them." When this was said, the Blessed One remained silent.

Then a second time, when the night was far advanced, at the end of the middle watch, Ven. Ānanda got up from his seat, arranged his robe over one shoulder, stood facing the Blessed One, paying homage to him with his hands placed palm-to-palm over his heart, and said to him, "The night, lord, is far advanced. The middle watch has ended. The visiting monks have been sitting here a long time. May the Blessed One greet them." When this was said, the Blessed One remained silent.

Then a third time, when the night was far advanced, at the end of the last watch, as dawn was approaching and the face of the night was beaming, Ven. Ānanda got up from his seat, arranged his robe over one shoulder, stood facing the Blessed One, paying homage to him with his hands placed palm-to-palm over his heart, and said to him, "The night, lord, is far advanced. The last watch has ended. Dawn is approaching and the face of the night is beaming. The visiting monks have been sitting here a long time. May the Blessed One greet them."

Then the Blessed One, emerging from his imperturbable concentration, said to Ven. Ānanda, "Ānanda, if you had known, not even that much would have occurred to you (to say).[1] I, along with all 500 of these monks, have been sitting in imperturbable concentration."

Then, on realizing the significance of that, the Blessed One on that occasion exclaimed:

In whom they're defeated– the thorn of sensuality, insult,
    assault,
    & imprisonment:
Like a mountain standing unperturbed,
    he doesn't quiver
    from pleasures & pains
        : a monk.

Note

1. All the major editions here read, nappaṭibhāseyya: "He/it would have not said in return." This makes no sense, so I follow a variant reading listed in the Burmese edition, nappaṭibheyya (the optative of paṭibhāti).

Ud 3:4 Sāriputta (Sāriputta Sutta)

I have heard that on one occasion the Blessed One was staying near Sāvatthī at Jeta's Grove, Anāthapiṇḍika's monastery. And on that occasion Ven. Sāriputta was sitting not far from the Blessed One, his legs crossed, his body held erect, having set mindfulness to the fore. The Blessed One saw Ven. Sāriputta sitting not far away, his legs crossed, his body held erect, having set mindfulness to the fore.

Then, on realizing the significance of that, the Blessed One on that occasion exclaimed:

> As a mountain of rock
> is unwavering, well-settled,
> so a monk whose delusion is ended > doesn't quiver–
> just like a mountain.[1]

Note

1. This verse also appears among the verses attributed to Ven. Revata at Thag 14:1 (verse 651 in the PTS edition) and among the verses attributed to Ven. Sāriputta at Thag 17:2 (verse 1000 in the PTS edition).

Ud 3:5 Mahā Moggallāna (Kolita Sutta)

I have heard that on one occasion the Blessed One was staying near Sāvatthī at Jeta's Grove, Anāthapiṇḍika's monastery. And on that occasion Ven. Mahā Moggallāna was sitting not far from the Blessed One, his legs crossed, his body held erect, having mindfulness immersed in the body well-established within. The Blessed One saw Ven. Mahā Moggallāna sitting not far away, his legs crossed, his body held erect, having mindfulness immersed in the body well-established within.

Then, on realizing the significance of that, the Blessed One on that occasion exclaimed:

> With mindfulness immersed in the body > well-established, restrained > with regard to the six contact-media– > continually centered,
> a monk
> can know
> unbinding for himself.

Ud 3:6 Pilinda (Pilinda Sutta)

I have heard that on one occasion the Blessed One was staying near Rājagaha at the Bamboo Forest, the Squirrels' refuge. Now at on that occasion Ven. Pilindavaccha went around addressing the monks as if they were outcastes.

So a large number of monks went to the Blessed One and, on arrival, bowed down to him and sat to one side. As they were sitting there they said to him, "Lord, Ven. Pilindavaccha goes around addressing the monks as if they were outcastes."

Then the Blessed One told a certain monk, "Come, monk. In my name, call Pilindavaccha, saying, 'The Teacher calls you, friend Vaccha.'"

Responding, "As you say, lord," to the Blessed One, the monk went to Ven. Pilindavaccha and on arrival said to him, "The Teacher calls you, friend Vaccha."

Responding, "As you say, my friend," to the monk, Ven. Pilindavaccha went to the Blessed One and, on arrival, having bowed down to him, sat to one side. As he was sitting there, the Blessed One said to him, "Is it true, Pilindavaccha, that you go around addressing the monks as if they were outcastes?"

"Yes, lord."

Then the Blessed One, having directed attention to Ven. Pilindavaccha's previous lives, said to the monks, "Don't take offense at the monk Vaccha. It's not out of inner hatred that he goes around addressing the monks as if they were outcastes. For 500 consecutive lifetimes the monk Vaccha has been born in brahman families. For a long time he has been accustomed to addressing people as outcastes. That's why he goes around addressing the monks as if they were outcastes."

Then, on realizing the significance of that, the Blessed One on that occasion exclaimed:

In whom there's no deceit or conceit,
his greed ended,
unpossessive, free from longing,
his anger dispelled,
his mind unbound:[1]
He's a contemplative.
He's a brahman
: a monk.

Note

1. The first part of this verse is nearly identical with the first part of a verse in Sn 3:4 (verse 469 in the PTS edition).

Ud 3:7 Mahā Kassapa (Kassapa Sutta)

I have heard that on one occasion the Blessed One was staying near Rājagaha at the Bamboo Forest, the Squirrels' Sanctuary. And on that occasion Ven. Mahā Kassapa was staying at the Pipphali Cave, sitting for seven days in a single session, having attained a certain level of concentration. Then, with the passing of seven days, he emerged from that concentration. To him, emerging from that concentration, the thought occurred: "What if I were to go into Rājagaha for alms?"

Now on that occasion 500 devatās were in a state of eagerness for the chance to give alms to Ven. Mahā Kassapa. But Ven. Mahā Kassapa, turning down those 500 devatās, early in the morning adjusted his under robe and–carrying his bowl & robes–went into Rājagaha for alms.

Now on that occasion Sakka, the deva-king, wanted to give alms to Ven. Mahā Kassapa. So, assuming the appearance of a weaver, he was working a loom, while Sujātā, an asura-maiden, filled the shuttle. Then, as Ven. Mahā Kassapa was going on an almsround that bypassed no donors[1] in Rājagaha, he arrived at Sakka's home. Sakka saw him coming from afar and, on seeing him, came out of house to meet him. Taking the bowl from his hand, entered the house, took cooked rice from the pot, filled the bowl, and gave it back to Ven. Mahā Kassapa. And that gift of alms included many kinds of curry, many kinds of sauces.

The thought occurred to Ven. Mahā Kassapa, "Now, who is this being with such power & might as this?" Then the thought occurred to him, "This is Sakka, the deva-king, isn't it?" On realizing this, he said to Sakka, "Is this your doing, Kosiya?[2] Don't ever do anything like this again."

"We, too, need merit, Ven. Kassapa. We, too, have use for merit."

Then, bowing down to Ven. Mahā Kassapa and circling him to the right, Sakka rose up into the air and, while up in the sky, exclaimed three times:

"O the alms, the foremost alms, well-established in Kassapa!"

"O the alms, the foremost alms, well-established in Kassapa!"

"O the alms, the foremost alms, well-established in Kassapa!"

The Blessed One–with his divine hearing-property, surpassing that of the human–heard Sakka the deva-king, while up in the sky, exclaiming three times:

"O the alms, the foremost alms, well-established in Kassapa!"

"O the alms, the foremost alms, well-established in Kassapa!"

"O the alms, the foremost alms, well-established in Kassapa!"

On realizing the significance of that, the Blessed One on that occasion exclaimed:

> The monk going for alms,
> supporting himself and no other:
> The devas adore one who is Such,
> calmed & ever mindful.

Notes

1. Going on an almsround that bypasses no donors is one of the thirteen optional ascetic (dhutaṅga) practices. See Thag 16:7.

2. Kosiya–"Owl"–is Sakka's clan name.

Ud 3:8 Alms (Piṇḍa Sutta)

I have heard that on one occasion the Blessed One was staying near Sāvatthī at Jeta's Grove, Anāthapiṇḍika's monastery. And on that occasion a large number of monks, after the meal, on returning from their alms round, were sitting gathered together at the kareri-tree pavilion when this discussion arose: "Friends, an alms-collecting monk,[1] while going for alms, periodically sees agreeable sights via the eye. He periodically hears agreeable sounds via the ear… smells agreeable aromas via the nose… tastes agreeable flavors via the tongue… touches agreeable tactile sensations via the body. An alms-collecting monk, while going for alms, is honored, respected, revered, venerated, and given homage.

"So, friends, let's become alms-collecting monks. Then we, too, while going for alms, will periodically get to see agreeable sights via the eye… to hear agreeable sounds via the ear… to smell agreeable aromas via the nose… to taste agreeable flavors via the tongue… to touch agreeable tactile sensations via the body. We, too, while going for alms, will be honored, respected, revered, venerated, and given homage." And this discussion came to no conclusion.

Then the Blessed One, emerging from his seclusion in the late afternoon, went to the kareri-tree pavilion and, on arrival, sat down on a seat laid out. Seated, he addressed the monks: "For what topic are you sitting together here? And what was the discussion that came to no conclusion?"

"Just now, lord, after the meal, on returning from our alms round, we were sitting gathered together here at the kareri-tree pavilion when this discussion arose: [They repeat what had been said.]"

"It isn't proper, monks, that sons of good families, on having gone forth out of faith from home to the homeless life, should talk on such a topic. When you have gathered you have two duties: either Dhamma-talk or noble silence."[2]

Then, on realizing the significance of that, the Blessed One on that occasion exclaimed:

> The monk going for alms,
> supporting himself and no other:
> The devas adore one who is Such
> if he's not intent > on fame & praise.

Notes

1. A monk who makes a steady practice of eating only the food received while going for alms.

2. SN 21:1 equates noble silence with the second jhāna. This apparently relates to the fact that directed thought and evaluation, which MN 44 identifies as verbal fabrications, are abandoned when going from the first jhāna into the second.

Ud 3:9 Crafts (Sippa Sutta)

I have heard that on one occasion the Blessed One was staying near Sāvatthī at Jeta's Grove, Anāthapiṇḍika's monastery. Now at that time a large number of monks, after the meal, on returning from their alms round, were sitting gathered together at a pavilion when this discussion arose: "Who, friends, knows a craft? Who's studying which craft? Which is the supreme among crafts?"

With regard to that, some said, "The elephant-craft is the supreme craft among crafts." Some said, "The horse-craft is the supreme craft among crafts" … "The chariot-craft…" … "Archery…" … "Swordsmanship…" … "Signaling[1]…" … "Calculating…" … "Accounting…" … "Writing…" … "Literary composition…" … "Cosmology…" Some said, "Geomancy is the supreme craft among crafts." And this discussion came to no conclusion.

Then the Blessed One, emerging from his seclusion in the late afternoon, went to the pavilion and, on arrival, sat down on a seat laid out. As he was sitting there, he addressed the monks: "For what topic are you sitting together here? And what was the discussion that came to no conclusion?"

"Just now, lord, after the meal, on returning from our alms round, we were sitting gathered together here at the pavilion when this discussion arose: [They repeat what had been said.]"

"It isn't proper, monks, that sons of good families, on having gone forth out of faith from home to the homeless life, should talk on such a topic. When you have gathered you have two duties: either Dhamma-talk or noble silence."

Then, on realizing the significance of that, the Blessed One on that occasion exclaimed:

> Supporting himself > without a craft–

light, desiring the goal–
his faculties controlled, released everywhere;
living in no home,
unpossessive,
free from longing,
having slain Māra,
going alone
: a monk.

Ud 3:10 Surveying the World (Loka Sutta)

I have heard that on one occasion, the Blessed One was staying at Uruvelā on the bank of the Nerañjarā River at the root of the Bodhi tree–the tree of awakening–newly awakened. And on that occasion he sat at the root of the Bodhi tree for seven days in one session, sensitive to the bliss of release. Then, with the passing of seven days, after emerging from that concentration, he surveyed the world with the eye of an Awakened One. As he did so, he saw living beings burning with the many fevers and aflame with the many fires born of passion, aversion, & delusion.

Then, on realizing the significance of that, he on that occasion exclaimed:

> This world is burning.
> Afflicted by contact,
> it calls disease a 'self.'
> By whatever means it supposes [anything], > it becomes otherwise than that.[1] > Becoming otherwise, > the world is > attached to becoming,
> afflicted by becoming,
> and yet delights
> in that very becoming.
> Where there's delight,
> there is fear.
> What one fears
> is stressful.
> This holy life is lived > for the abandoning of becoming.

Whatever contemplatives or brahmans say that liberation from becoming is by means of becoming, all of them are not released from becoming, I say.

And whatever contemplatives or brahmans say that escape from becoming is by means of non-becoming, all of them have not escaped from becoming, I say.

For this stress comes into play in dependence on every acquisition.[2]
With the ending of every clinging/sustenance, there's no stress coming into play.
    Look at this world:
Beings, afflicted with thick ignorance, are unreleased
from passion for what has come to be.
All levels of becoming,
    anywhere,
    in any way,
are inconstant, stressful, subject to change.
Seeing this–as it's come to be–
with right discernment, one abandons craving for becoming and doesn't delight in non-becoming.[3]
From the total ending of craving comes fading & cessation without remainder:
    unbinding.
For the monk unbound
through lack of clinging/sustenance, there's no further becoming.
He has conquered Māra,
    won the battle,
having gone beyond becomings
        : Such.

Notes

1. In other words, regardless of whatever one bases one's construal of an experience on, by the time the construal is complete, the base has already changed.

2. Reading sabb'upadhiṁ hi with the Thai edition. The Burmese and Sri Lankan editions read upadhiṁ hi: "For this stress comes into play in dependence on acquisition." The parallel passage in the Udānavarga (32.36) agrees with this latter version.

3. This passage indicates the way out of the dilemma posed above, that one cannot gain release either through becoming or non-becoming. Rather than focus on whether one wants to take "what has come to be" in the direction of becoming or non-becoming, one develops dispassion for "what has come to be" as it occurs, and this provides the way out. On this point, see The Paradox of Becoming, chapters 2 and 6.

4 : Meghiya

Ud 4:1 Meghiya (Meghiya Sutta)

I have heard that on one occasion the Blessed One was staying among the Cālikans, at Cālikā Mountain. And on that occasion Ven. Meghiya was his attendant. Then Ven. Meghiya went to the Blessed One and, on arrival, having bowed down to him, stood to one side. As he was standing there he said to the Blessed One, "I would like to go into Jantu Village for alms."

"Then do, Meghiya, what you think it is now time to do."

Then in the early morning, Ven. Meghiya adjusted his under robe and–carrying his bowl & robes–went into Jantu Village for alms. Having gone for alms in Jantu Village, after the meal, returning from his alms round, he went to the bank of the Kimikālā River. As he was walking up & down along the bank of the river to exercise his legs, he saw a pleasing, charming mango grove. Seeing it, the thought occurred to him: "How pleasing & charming this mango grove! It's enough for a young man of good family intent on exertion to exert himself [in meditation]. If the Blessed One gives me permission, I would like to exert myself [in meditation] in this mango grove."

So Ven. Meghiya went to the Blessed One and, on arrival, having bowed down to him, sat to one side. As he was sitting there he said to the Blessed One, "Just now, in the early morning, I adjusted my under robe and–carrying my bowl & robes–went into Jantu Village for alms. Having gone for alms in Jantu Village, after the meal, returning from my alms round, I went to the bank of the Kimikālā River. As I was walking up & down along the bank of the river to exercise my legs, I saw a pleasing, charming mango grove. Seeing it, the thought occurred to me: 'How pleasing & charming this mango grove! It's enough for a young man of good family intent on exertion to exert himself [in meditation]. If the Blessed One gives me permission, I would like to exert myself [in meditation] in this mango grove.' If the Blessed One gives me permission, I would like to go to the mango grove to exert myself [in meditation]."

When this was said, the Blessed One responded to Ven. Meghiya, "As long as I am still alone, stay here until another monk comes."

A second time, Ven. Meghiya said to the Blessed One, "Lord, the Blessed One has nothing further to do, and nothing further to add to what he has done. I, however, have something further to do, and something further to add to what I have done. If the Blessed One gives me permission, I would like to go to the mango grove to exert myself [in meditation]."

A second time, the Blessed One responded to Ven. Meghiya, "As long as I am still alone, stay here until another monk comes."

A third time, Ven. Meghiya said to the Blessed One, "Lord, the Blessed One has nothing further to do, and nothing further to add to what he has done. I, however, have something further to do, and something further to add to what I have done. If the Blessed One gives me permission, I would like to go to the mango grove to exert myself [in meditation]."

"As you are talking about exertion, Meghiya, what can we say? Do what you think it is now time to do."

Then Ven. Meghiya, rising from his seat, bowing down to the Blessed One and, circling him to the right, went to the mango grove. On arrival, having gone deep into the grove, he sat down at the root of a certain tree for the day's abiding.

Now while Ven. Meghiya was staying in the mango grove, he was for the most part assailed by three kinds of unskillful thoughts: thoughts of sensuality, thoughts of ill will, and thoughts of doing harm. The thought occurred to him: "How amazing! How astounding! Even though it was through faith that I went forth from home to the homeless life, still I am overpowered by these three kinds of unskillful thoughts: thoughts of sensuality, thoughts of ill will, and thoughts of doing harm."

Emerging from his seclusion in the late afternoon, he went to the Blessed One and, on arrival, having bowed down to him, sat to one side. As he was sitting there he said to the Blessed One, "Just now, while I was staying in the mango grove, I was for the most part assailed by three kinds of unskillful thoughts: thoughts of sensuality, thoughts of ill will, and thoughts of doing harm. The thought occurred to me: 'How amazing! How astounding! Even though it was through faith that I went forth from home to the homeless life, still I am overpowered by these three kinds of unskillful thoughts: thoughts of sensuality, thoughts of ill will, and thoughts of doing harm.'"

"Meghiya, in one whose awareness-release is still immature, five qualities bring it to maturity. Which five?

"There is the case where a monk has admirable people as friends, companions, & colleagues. In one whose awareness-release is still immature, this is the first quality that brings it to maturity.

"Furthermore, the monk is virtuous. He dwells restrained in accordance with the Pāṭimokkha, consummate in his behavior & range of activity. He trains himself, having undertaken the training rules, seeing danger in the slightest faults. In one whose awareness-release is still immature, this is the second quality that brings it to maturity.

"Furthermore, he gets to hear at will, easily and without difficulty, talk that is truly sobering and conducive to the opening of awareness, i.e., talk on modesty, contentment, seclusion, non-entanglement, arousing persistence, virtue, concentration, discernment, release, and the knowledge & vision of release. In one whose awareness-release is still immature, this is the third quality that brings it to maturity.

"Furthermore, he keeps his persistence aroused for abandoning unskillful [mental] qualities and for taking on skillful qualities. He is steadfast, solid in his effort, not shirking his duties with regard to skillful qualities. In one whose awareness-release is still immature, this is the fourth quality that brings it to maturity.

"Furthermore, he is discerning, endowed with the discernment related to arising & passing away–noble, penetrating, leading to the right ending of stress. In one whose awareness-release is still immature, this is the fifth quality that brings it to maturity.

"Meghiya, in one whose awareness-release is still immature, these are the five qualities that bring it to maturity.

"Meghiya, when a monk has admirable people as friends, companions, & colleagues, it is to be expected that he will be virtuous, will dwell restrained in accordance with the Pāṭimokkha, consummate in his behavior & range of activity, and will train himself, having undertaken the training rules, seeing danger in the slightest faults.

"When a monk has admirable people as friends & colleagues, it is to be expected that he will get to hear at will, easily and without difficulty, talk that is truly sobering and conducive to the opening of awareness, i.e., talk on modesty, contentment, seclusion, non-entanglement, arousing persistence, virtue, concentration, discernment, release, and the knowledge & vision of release.

"When a monk has admirable people as friends, companions, & colleagues, it is to be expected that he will keep his persistence aroused for abandoning unskillful qualities and for taking on skillful qualities–steadfast, solid in his effort, not shirking his duties with regard to skillful qualities.

"When a monk has admirable people as friends, companions, & colleagues, it is to be expected that he will be discerning, endowed with the discernment relating to arising & passing away–noble, penetrating, leading to the right ending of stress.

"And furthermore, when the monk is established in these five qualities, there are four additional qualities he should develop: He should develop [contemplation of] the unattractive so as to abandon passion. He should develop good will so as to abandon ill will. He should develop mindfulness of in-&-out breathing so as to cut off thinking. He should develop the perception of inconstancy so as to uproot the conceit, 'I am.'[1] For a monk perceiving inconstancy, the perception of not-self is made steady. One perceiving not-self attains the uprooting of the conceit, 'I am'–unbinding right in the here-&-now."

Then, on realizing the significance of that, the Blessed One on that occasion exclaimed:

Little thoughts, subtle thoughts, when followed, stir up the heart.
Not comprehending the thoughts of the heart,

one runs here & there,
the mind out of control.
But comprehending the thoughts of the heart,
one who is ardent, mindful, restrains them.
When, followed, they stir up the heart, one awakened
lets them go without trace.

Ud 4:2 High-strung (Uddhata Sutta)

I have heard that on one occasion the Blessed One was staying in Upavattana, the Mallan sal grove near Kusinarā.[1] And on that occasion, not far from the Blessed One, many monks were staying in wilderness huts: high-strung, rowdy, unruly, talkative, of loose words & muddled mindfulness, unalert, unconcentrated, their minds scattered, their faculties left wide open.

The Blessed One saw those many monks staying in wilderness huts: high-strung, rowdy, unruly, talkative, of loose words & muddled mindfulness, unalert, unconcentrated, their minds scattered, their faculties left wide open.

Then, on realizing the significance of that, the Blessed One on that occasion exclaimed:

> By leaving your body unprotected, > being immersed in wrong view, > conquered by sloth & torpor,
> you go under Māra's sway.
> Therefore,
> with protected mind,
> ranging in right resolve,
> honoring right view,
> knowing rise-&-fall,
> conquering sloth & torpor, a monk > leaves all > bad destinations
> behind.

Ud 4:3 The Cowherd (Gopāla Sutta)

I have heard that on one occasion the Blessed One was wandering among the Kosalans with a large community of monks. Then, coming down from the road, he went to a certain tree, and on arrival sat down on a seat laid out. A certain cowherd then went to the Blessed One and, on arrival, having bowed down to him, sat to one side. As he was sitting there, the Blessed One, instructed, urged, roused, & encouraged him with Dhamma-talk. The cowherd–instructed, urged, roused, & encouraged by the Blessed One's talk on Dhamma–said to him, "Lord, may the Blessed One, together with the community of monks, acquiesce to my offer of tomorrow's meal."

The Blessed One acquiesced with silence.

Then the cowherd, understanding the Blessed One's acquiescence, got up from his seat, bowed down to the Blessed One and left, circling him to the right.

Then, after the night had passed, the cowherd–having prepared in his own home a great deal of thick milk-rice porridge & fresh ghee–announced the time of the meal to the Blessed One: "It's time, lord. The meal is ready."

So the Blessed One early in the morning adjusted his under robe and–carrying his bowl & robes–went together with the community of monks to the cowherd's home. On arrival, he sat down on a seat laid out. The cowherd, with his own hand, served & satisfied the community of monks headed by the Blessed One with thick milk-rice porridge & fresh ghee. Then, when the Blessed One had eaten and had rinsed his bowl & hands, the cowherd, taking a lower seat, sat down to one side. As he was sitting there, the Blessed One, instructed, urged, roused, & encouraged him with Dhamma-talk, then got up from his seat & left.

Now, not long after the Blessed One's departure, the cowherd was killed by a certain man between the boundaries of two villages. A large number of monks then went to the Blessed One and, on arrival, having bowed down to him, sat to one side. As they were sitting there, they told him, "The cowherd who today served & satisfied the community of monks headed by the Blessed One with thick milk-rice porridge & fresh ghee, has been killed, it is said, by a certain man between the boundaries of two villages."

Then, on realizing the significance of that, the Blessed One on that occasion exclaimed:

> Whatever an enemy
> might do to an enemy, > or a foe
> to a foe,
> the ill-directed mind
> can do to you
> even worse.[1]

Note

1. This verse also occurs at Dhp 42, where it is paired with Dhp 43:

> Whatever a mother, father
> or other kinsman
> might do for you,
> the well-directed mind
> can do for you
> even better.

Ud 4:4 Moonlit (Juñha Sutta)

I have heard that on one occasion the Blessed One was staying near Rājagaha at the Bamboo Forest, the Squirrels' Sanctuary. And on that occasion Ven. Sāriputta and Ven. Mahā Moggallāna were staying in Pigeon Cave. Then, on a moonlit night, Ven. Sāriputta–his head newly shaven–was sitting in the open air, having attained a certain level of concentration.

And on that occasion two yakkhas who were companions were flying from north to south on some business or other. They saw Ven. Sāriputta–his head newly shaven–sitting in the open air. Seeing him, the first yakkha said to the second, "I'm inspired to give this contemplative a blow on the head."

When this was said, the second yakkha said to the first, "Enough of that, my good friend. Don't lay a hand on the contemplative. He's an outstanding contemplative, of great power & great might."

A second time, the first yakkha said to the second, "I'm inspired to give this contemplative a blow on the head."

A second time, the second yakkha said to the first, "Enough of that, my good friend. Don't lay a hand on the contemplative. He's an outstanding contemplative, of great power & great might."

A third time, the first yakkha said to the second, "I'm inspired to give this contemplative a blow on the head."

A third time, the second yakkha said to the first, "Enough of that, my good friend. Don't lay a hand on the contemplative. He's an outstanding contemplative, of great power & great might."

Then the first yakkha, ignoring the second yakkha, gave Ven. Sāriputta a blow on the head. And with that blow he might have knocked over an elephant seven or eight cubits tall, or split a great rocky crag. But right there the yakkha–yelling, "I'm burning!"–fell into the Great Hell.

Now, Ven. Moggallāna–with his divine eye, pure and surpassing the human–saw the yakkha give Ven. Sāriputta a blow on the head. Seeing this, he went to Ven. Sāriputta and, on arrival, said to him, "I hope you are well, friend Sāriputta. I hope you are comfortable. I hope you are feeling no pain."

"I am well, friend Moggallāna. I am comfortable. But I do have a slight headache."

"How amazing, friend Sāriputta! How astounding! How great your power & might! Just now a yakkha gave you a blow on the head. So great was that blow that he might have knocked over an elephant seven or eight cubits tall, or split a great rocky crag. But all you say is this: 'I am well, friend Moggallāna. I am comfortable. But I do have a slight headache'!"

"How amazing, friend Moggallāna! How astounding! How great your power & might! Where you saw a yakkha just now, I didn't even see a dust devil!"

The Blessed One–with the divine ear-property, pure and surpassing the human–heard those two great beings conversing in this way. Then, on realizing the significance of that, the Blessed One on that occasion exclaimed:

> Whose mind, standing like rock,
> doesn't shake,
> dispassionate for things that spark passion,
> unprovoked by things that spark provocation:
> When one's mind is developed like this,
> from where can there come to him > suffering & stress?[1]

Note

1. A variant of this verse is attributed to Ven. Khitaka at Thag 2:36 (verses 191-192 in the PTS edition):

> Whose mind, standing like rock,
> doesn't shake,
> dispassionate for things that spark passion,
> unprovoked by things that spark provocation?

When one's mind is developed like this,
from where can there come to him
suffering & stress?

My mind, standing like rock,
doesn't shake,
dispassionate for things that spark passion,
unprovoked by things that spark provocation.
When my mind is developed like this,
from where can there come to me
suffering & stress?

Ud 4:5 The Bull Elephant (Nāga Sutta)

I have heard that on one occasion the Blessed One was staying near Kosambī at Kosita's monastery. And on that occasion the Blessed One lived hemmed in with monks, nuns, male & female lay followers, kings, royal ministers, sectarians, & their disciples. Hemmed in, he lived unpleasantly and not in ease. The thought occurred to him: "I now live hemmed in by monks, nuns, male & female lay followers, kings, royal ministers, sectarians, & their disciples. Hemmed in, I live unpleasantly and not in ease. What if I were to live alone, apart from the crowd?"

So, early in the morning, the Blessed One adjusted his under robe and–carrying his bowl & robes–went into Kosambī for alms. Then, having gone for alms in Kosambī, after the meal, returning from his alms round, he set his own lodgings in order and, carrying his bowl & robes, without telling his attendant, without informing the community of monks–alone & without a companion–left on a wandering tour toward Palileyyaka. After wandering by stages, he reached Palileyyaka. There he stayed in Palileyyaka in the protected forest grove at the root of the auspicious sal tree.

It so happened that a certain bull elephant was living hemmed in by elephants, cow-elephants, calf-elephants, & baby elephants. He fed off grass with cut-off tips. They chewed up his stash of broken-off branches. He drank disturbed water. And when he came up from his bathing-place, cow-elephants went along, banging up against his body. Hemmed in, he lived unpleasantly and not in ease. The thought occurred to him: "I now live hemmed in by elephants, cow-elephants, calf-elephants, & baby elephants. I feed off grass with cut-off tips. They chew up my stash of broken-off branches. I drink disturbed water. And when I come up from my bathing place, cow-elephants go along, banging up against my body. Hemmed in, I live unpleasantly and not in ease. What if I were to live alone, apart from the crowd?"

So the bull elephant, leaving the herd, went to Palileyyaka, to the protected forest grove and the root of the auspicious sal tree–to where the Blessed One was staying. There he kept the grass down in the area where the Blessed One was staying, and brought drinking water and washing water for the Blessed One with his trunk.

Then, when the Blessed One was alone in seclusion, this train of thought appeared to his awareness: "Before, I lived hemmed in by monks, nuns, male & female lay followers, kings, royal ministers, sectarians, & their disciples. Hemmed in, I lived unpleasantly and not in ease. But now I live not hemmed in by monks, nuns, male & female lay followers, kings, royal ministers, sectarians, & their disciples. Not hemmed in, I live pleasantly and in ease."

And this train of thought appeared to the awareness of the bull elephant, "Before, I lived hemmed in by elephants, cow-elephants, calf-elephants, & baby elephants. I fed off grass with cut-off tips. They chewed up my stash of broken-off branches. I drank disturbed water. And when I came up from my bathing place, cow-elephants went along, banging up against my body. Hemmed in, I lived unpleasantly and not in ease. But now I live not hemmed in by elephants, cow-elephants, calf-elephants, & baby elephants. I feed off grass with uncut tips. They don't chew up my stash of broken-off branches. I drink undisturbed water. When I come up from my bathing place, cow-elephants don't go along, banging up against my body. Not hemmed in, I live pleasantly and in ease."[1]

Then the Blessed One, realizing his own seclusion and knowing the train of thought in the bull elephant's awareness, on that occasion exclaimed:

This
harmonizes
mind with mind–
the great one's with the great one's[2]–
the elephant with tusks like chariot poles:
that each finds joy,
alone,
in the forest.

Notes

1. Mv.X.4.6-7 places the story of the elephant's service to the Buddha in the context of the quarrel at Kosambī, but the details of how the Buddha left Kosambī given in Mv.X.3 are different.

2. Great one = nāga. This term can mean magical serpent or large elephant, and is often used as an epithet for an arahant.

Ud 4:6 Piṇḍola (Piṇḍola Sutta)

I have heard that on one occasion the Blessed One was staying near Sāvatthī at Jeta's Grove, Anāthapiṇḍika's monastery. And on that occasion Ven. Piṇḍola Bhāradvāja was sitting not far from the Blessed One, his legs crossed, his body held erect–a wilderness dweller, an alms-goer, a rag-robe wearer, an owner of only one set of three robes, modest, content, solitary, unentangled, his persistence aroused, an advocate of the ascetic practices, devoted to the heightened mind. The Blessed One saw Ven. Piṇḍola Bhāradvāja sitting not far away, his legs crossed, his body held erect–a wilderness dweller, an alms-goer, a rag-robe wearer, an owner of only one set of three robes, modest, content, solitary, unentangled, his persistence aroused, an advocate of the ascetic practices, devoted to the heightened mind.

Then, on realizing the significance of that, the Blessed One on that occasion exclaimed:

> Not disparaging, not injuring,
> restraint in line with the Pāṭimokkha, > moderation in food,
> dwelling in seclusion,
> commitment to the heightened mind:
> this is the teaching
> of the Awakened.[1]

Note

1. This verse also occurs at Dhp 185, where it forms part of a set including Dhp 183—184:

> The non-doing of any evil, > the performance of what's skillful,
> the cleansing of one's own mind:
> this is the teaching

of the Awakened.
Patient endurance:
the foremost austerity.
Unbinding:
the foremost,
so say the Awakened.
He who injures another
is no contemplative.
He who mistreats another,
no monk.

Ud 4:7 Sāriputta (Sāriputta Sutta)

I have heard that on one occasion the Blessed One was staying near Sāvatthī at Jeta's Grove, Anāthapiṇḍika's monastery. And on that occasion Ven. Sāriputta was sitting not far from the Blessed One–his legs crossed, his body held erect–modest, content, solitary, unentangled, his persistence aroused, devoted to the heightened mind. The Blessed One saw Ven. Sāriputta sitting not far away–his legs crossed, his body held erect–modest, content, solitary, unentangled, his persistence aroused, devoted to the heightened mind.

Then, on realizing the significance of that, the Blessed One on that occasion exclaimed:

> Of heightened awareness & heedful,
> the sage trained in sagacity's way:
> He has no sorrows, one who is Such,
> calmed & ever mindful.[1]

Note

1. This is the verse that Ven. Cūḷa Panthaka used to exhort the nuns in the origin story to Pācittiya 22. It also appears at Thag 1:68.

Ud 4:8 Sundarī (Sundarī Sutta)

I have heard that on one occasion the Blessed One was staying near Sāvatthī at Jeta's Grove, Anāthapiṇḍika's monastery. Now at that time the Blessed One was worshipped, revered, honored, venerated, and given homage–a recipient of robes, alms food, lodgings, & medicinal requisites for the sick. The community of monks was also worshipped, revered, honored, venerated, and given homage–a recipient of robes, alms food, lodgings, & medicinal requisites for the sick. But the wanderers of other sects were not worshipped, revered, honored, venerated, or given homage; nor were they recipients of robes, alms food, lodgings, or medicinal requisites for the sick.

So the wanderers of other sects–unable to stand the veneration given to the Blessed One and the community of monks–went to Sundarī the female wanderer and, on arrival, said to her, "Sundarī, would you dare to do something for the benefit of your kinsmen?"

"What shall I do, masters? What can I not do?[1] I have given up even my life for the benefit of my kinsmen!"

"In that case, sister, go often to Jeta's Grove."

Responding, "As you say, masters," to those wanderers of other sects, Sundarī the female wanderer went often to Jeta's Grove. When the wanderers of other sects knew that many people had seen Sundarī the female wanderer going often to Jeta's Grove, then–having murdered her and buried her right there in the moat-ditch surrounding Jeta's Grove–they went to King Pasenadi Kosala and, on arrival, said to him, "Great king, we can't find Sundarī the female wanderer."

"But where do you suspect she is?"

"At Jeta's Grove, great king."

"Then in that case, search Jeta's Grove."

Then those wanderers of other sects, having searched Jeta's Grove, having dug up what they had buried in the surrounding moat-ditch, having mounted it on a litter, took it into Sāvatthī and went from street to street, crossroad to crossroad, stirring up people's indignation: "See, masters, the handiwork of the Sakyan-son contemplatives. They're shameless, these Sakyan-son contemplatives: unvirtuous, evil-natured, liars, unholy, though they claim to be practicing the Dhamma, practicing what is harmonious, practicing the holy life, speakers of the truth, virtuous, fine-natured. They have no quality of a contemplative, no holy quality. Destroyed is their quality of a contemplative! Destroyed is their holy quality! From where is their quality of a contemplative? From where, their holy quality? Gone are they from any quality of a contemplative! Gone from any holy quality! How can a man, having done a man's business with a woman, take her life?"

So on that occasion, people seeing monks in Sāvatthī would insult, revile, irritate, & harass them with discourteous, abusive language: "They're shameless, these Sakyan-son contemplatives: unvirtuous, evil-natured, liars, unholy, though they claim to be practicing the Dhamma, practicing what is harmonious, practicing the holy life, speakers of the truth, virtuous, fine-natured. They have no quality of a contemplative, no holy quality. Destroyed is their quality of a contemplative! Destroyed is their holy quality! From where is their quality of a contemplative? From where, their holy quality? Gone are they from any quality of a contemplative! Gone from any holy quality! How can a man, having done a man's business with a woman, take her life?"

Then, early in the morning, a large number of monks adjusted their under robes and–carrying their bowls & robes–went into Sāvatthī for alms. Then, having gone for alms in Sāvatthī, after the meal, returning from their alms round, they went to the Blessed One and, on arrival, having bowed down to him, sat to one side. As they were sitting there they said to the Blessed One, "At present, lord, people seeing monks in Sāvatthī insult, revile, irritate, & harass them with discourteous, abusive language: 'They're shameless, these Sakyan-son contemplatives: unvirtuous, evil-natured, liars, unholy.... How can a man, having done a man's business with a woman, take her life?'"

"Monks, this noise will not last long. It will last only seven days. With the passing of seven days, it will disappear. So in that case, when those people, on seeing monks, insult, revile, irritate, & harass them with discourteous, abusive language, counter their accusation with this verse:

> "He goes to hell,
> the one who asserts
> what didn't take place,
> as does the one
> who, having done,
> says, 'I didn't.'
> Both–low-acting people–
> there become equal:
> after death, in the world beyond."[2]

So, having learned this verse in the Blessed One's presence, the monks–whenever people, on seeing monks in Sāvatthī, insulted, reviled, irritated, & harassed them with discourteous, abusive language–countered the accusation with this verse:

> "He goes to hell,
> the one who asserts
> what didn't take place,
> as does the one
> who, having done,
> says, 'I didn't.'
> Both–low-acting people–
> there become equal:
> after death, in the world beyond."

The thought occurred to those people, "They're innocent, these Sakyan-son contemplatives. It wasn't done by them.[3] They're taking an oath, these Sakyan-son contemplatives." And so that noise didn't last long. It lasted only seven days. With the passing of seven days, it disappeared.

Then a large number of monks went to the Blessed One and, on arrival, having bowed down to him, sat to one side. As they were sitting there, they said to him, "It's amazing, lord. It's astounding–how well-said that was by the Blessed One: 'Monks, this noise will not last long. It will last only seven days. With the passing of seven days, it will disappear.' Lord, that noise has disappeared."

Then, on realizing the significance of that, the Blessed One on that occasion exclaimed:

They stab with their words –people unrestrained–
as they do, with arrows,
a tusker gone into battle.[4] Hearing abusive words spoken, one should endure them:
  a monk with unbothered mind.

Notes

1. Following the Sri Lankan and Burmese editions. In the Thai edition, this sentence reads, less effectively, "What can I do?"

2. This verse = Dhp 306.

3. Reading na imehi kataṁ, sapant'ime samaṇā sakya-puttiyā with the Sri Lankan and Burmese editions. The Thai reads, less grammatically, na imehi kataṁ, pāpant'ime samaṇā sakya-puttiyā.

4. Because sarehi can mean either "with arrows" or "with voices," this verse can also be translated:

They goad with their words
  –people unrestrained–
as they do, with shouts,
a tusker gone into battle.

The verse thus yields two equally valid interpretations:

a) The people stabbing the elephant with arrows (sarehi) are enemy soldiers, trying to bring it down.

b) The people goading the elephant with their shouts and voices (sarehi) are soldiers fighting on the same side as the elephant, urging it to charge into danger.

The Commentary gives only the first interpretation. But if we accept both interpretations, the verse contains a more useful double warning: When there's a controversy, beware of the unrestrained people on both sides. Learn to endure the hurtful words of those on the other side who want to bring you down, and the hurtful words of those on your side who try to rouse your anger so that you will say something rash.

Ud 4:9 Upasena Vaṅgantaputta (Upasena Vaṅgantaputta Sutta)

I have heard that on one occasion the Blessed One was staying near Rājagaha at the Bamboo Forest, the Squirrels' Sanctuary. And on that occasion, when Ven. Upasena Vaṅgantaputta was alone in seclusion, this line of thinking appeared to his awareness: "What a gain, what a true gain it is for me that my teacher is the Blessed One, worthy and fully self-awakened; that I have gone forth from home to the homeless life in a well-taught Dhamma & Vinaya; that my companions in the holy life are virtuous and endowed with admirable qualities; that I have achieved culmination in terms of the precepts; that my mind is unified and well-concentrated; that I am an arahant, with effluents ended; that I have great power & great might. Fortunate has been my life; fortunate will be my death."

Then the Blessed One, comprehending with his awareness the line of thinking that had appeared to Ven. Upasena Vaṅgantaputta's awareness, on that occasion exclaimed:

> He doesn't regret
> what life has been,
> doesn't grieve
> at death,
> if–enlightened[1]–
> he has seen that state.
> He doesn't grieve
> in the midst of grief.
>
> For one who has crushed > craving for becoming– > the monk of peaceful mind– > birth & the wandering on
> are totally ended.

He has no further becoming.[2]

Notes

1. Enlightened (dhīra): Throughout this translation I have rendered buddha as "awakened," and dhīra as "enlightened." As Jan Gonda points out in his book, The Vision of the Vedic Poets, the word dhīra was used in Vedic and Buddhist poetry to mean a person who has the heightened powers of mental vision needed to perceive the "light" of the underlying principles of the cosmos, together with the expertise to implement those principles in the affairs of life and to reveal them to others. A person enlightened in this sense may also be awakened, but is not necessarily so.

2. This last verse is identical with a verse in Sn 3:12 (verse 746 in the PTS edition).

Ud 4:10 Sāriputta (Sāriputta Sutta)

I have heard that on one occasion the Blessed One was staying near Sāvatthī at Jeta's Grove, Anāthapiṇḍika's monastery. And on that occasion Ven. Sāriputta was sitting not far from the Blessed One–his legs crossed, his body held erect–reflecting on the peace within himself. The Blessed One saw Ven. Sāriputta sitting not far away–his legs crossed, his body held erect–reflecting on the peace within himself.

Then, on realizing the significance of that, the Blessed One on that occasion exclaimed:

> For the monk whose mind is > peaceful, at peace, > whose cord is cut,[1]
> birth & the wandering on
> are totally ended.
> Freed is he
> from Māra's bonds.

Note

1. The cord (to becoming) is craving.

5 : Soṇa the Elder

Ud 5:1 The King (Rājan Sutta)

I have heard that on one occasion the Blessed One was staying near Sāvatthī at Jeta's Grove, Anāthapiṇḍika's monastery. And on that occasion King Pasenadi Kosala had gone with Queen Mallikā to the upper palace. Then he said to her, "Mallikā, is there anyone dearer to you than yourself?"

"No, great king. There is no one dearer to me than myself. And what about you, great king? Is there anyone dearer to you than yourself?"

"No, Mallikā. There is no one dearer to me than myself."

Then the king, descending from the palace, went to the Blessed One and, on arrival, having bowed down to him, sat to one side. As he was sitting there, he said to the Blessed One, "Just now, lord, when I had gone with Queen Mallikā to the upper palace, I said to her, 'Mallikā, is there anyone dearer to you than yourself?'

"When this was said, she said to me, 'No, great king. There is no one dearer to me than myself. And what about you, great king? Is there anyone dearer to you than yourself?'

"When this was said, I said to her, 'No, Mallikā. There is no one dearer to me than myself.'"

Then, on realizing the significance of that, the Blessed One on that occasion exclaimed:

> Searching all directions > with your awareness,
> you find no one dearer > than yourself.
> In the same way, others are thickly dear to themselves.

So you shouldn't hurt others
        if you love yourself.

Ud 5:2 Short-lived (Appāyuka Sutta)

I have heard that on one occasion the Blessed One was staying near Sāvatthī at Jeta's Grove, Anāthapiṇḍika's monastery. Then Ven. Ānanda, emerging from his seclusion in the late afternoon, went to the Blessed One and, on arrival, having bowed down to him, sat to one side. As he was sitting there he said to the Blessed One, "It's amazing, sir. It's astounding–how short-lived the Blessed One's mother was. Seven days after the Blessed One's birth she died and reappeared among the Contented [Tusita] (deva-) group."

"That's the way it is, Ānanda. That's the way it is, for the mothers of bodhisattas are short-lived. Seven days after the bodhisattas' birth, the bodhisattas' mothers pass away and reappear among the Contented (deva-) group."

Then, on realizing the significance of that, the Blessed One on that occasion exclaimed:

> Those who have come to be,
> those who will be:
> All
> will go,
> leaving the body behind.
> The skillful person, > realizing the loss of all,
> should live the holy life
> ardently.

Ud 5:3 The Leper (Kuṭṭhi Sutta)

I have heard that on one occasion the Blessed One was staying near Rājagaha at the Bamboo Forest, the Squirrels' Sanctuary. And on that occasion in Rājagaha there was a leper named Suppabuddha, a poor, pitiful wretch of a person. And on that occasion the Blessed One was sitting surrounded by a large assembly, teaching the Dhamma. Suppabuddha the leper saw the large gathering of people from afar and thought to himself, "Without a doubt, someone must be distributing staple or non-staple food there. Why don't I go over to that large group of people, and maybe there I'll get some staple or non-staple food." So he went over to the large group of people. Then he saw the Blessed One sitting surrounded by a large assembly, teaching the Dhamma. On seeing this, he realized, "There's no one distributing staple or non-staple food there. That's Gotama the contemplative (sitting) surrounded, teaching the Dhamma. Why don't I listen to the Dhamma?" So he sat down to one side right there, [thinking,] "I, too, will listen to the Dhamma."

Then the Blessed One, having encompassed the awareness of the entire assembly with his awareness, asked himself, "Now who here is capable of understanding the Dhamma?" He saw Suppabuddha the leper sitting in the assembly, and on seeing him the thought occurred to him, "This person here is capable of understanding the Dhamma." So, aiming at Suppabuddha the leper, he gave a step-by-step talk, i.e., he proclaimed a talk on generosity, on virtue, on heaven; he declared the drawbacks, degradation, & corruption of sensuality, and the rewards of renunciation. Then when the Blessed One knew that Suppabuddha the leper's mind was ready, malleable, free from hindrances, elevated, & clear, he then gave the Dhamma-talk peculiar to Awakened Ones, i.e., stress, origination, cessation, & path. And just as a clean cloth, free of stains, would properly absorb a dye, in the same way, as Suppabuddha the leper was sitting in that very seat, the dustless, stainless Dhamma eye arose within him, "Whatever is subject to origination is all subject to cessation."

Having seen the Dhamma, reached the Dhamma, known the Dhamma, gained a foothold in the Dhamma, having crossed over & beyond doubt, having had no more perplexity, having gained fearlessness & independence from others with regard to the Teacher's message, he got up from his seat and went to the Blessed One. On arrival, having bowed down to the Blessed One, he sat to one side. As he was sitting there he said to the Blessed One, "Magnificent, lord! Magnificent! Just as if he were to place upright what was overturned, to reveal what was hidden, to show the way to one who was lost, or to carry a lamp into the dark so that those with eyes could see forms, in the same way has the Blessed One–through many lines of reasoning–made the Dhamma clear. I go to the Blessed One for refuge, to the Dhamma, and to the Community of monks. May the Blessed One remember me as a lay follower who has gone to him for refuge, from this day forward, for life."

Then Suppabuddha the leper, having been instructed, urged, roused, & encouraged by the Blessed One's Dhamma talk, delighting in & approving of the Blessed One's words, got up from his seat, bowed down to the Blessed One and left, circling him to the right. Not long after his departure he was attacked & killed by a cow with a young calf.

Then a large number of monks went to the Blessed One and, on arrival, having bowed down to him, sat to one side. As they were sitting there, they said to the Blessed One, "Lord, the leper named Suppabuddha, whom the Blessed One instructed, urged, roused, & encouraged with a Dhamma talk, has died. What is his destination? What is his future state?"

"Monks, Suppabuddha the leper was wise. He practiced the Dhamma in accordance with the Dhamma and did not pester me with issues related to the Dhamma. With the destruction of the first three fetters, he is a stream-winner, not subject to states of deprivation, headed for self-awakening for sure."

When this was said, one of the monks said to the Blessed One, "Lord, what was the cause, what was the reason, why Suppabuddha the leper was such a poor, pitiful wretch of a person?"

"Once, monks, in this very Rājagaha, Suppabuddha the leper was the son of a rich money-lender. While being escorted to a pleasure park, he saw Tagarasikhin the Private Buddha[1] going for alms in the city. On seeing him, the thought occurred to him, 'Who is this leper prowling about?' Spitting and disrespectfully turning his left side to Tagarasikhin the Private Buddha, he left. As a result of that deed he boiled in hell for many years, many hundreds of years, many thousands of years, many hundreds of thousands of years. And then as a remainder of the result of that deed he became a poor, pitiful wretch of a person in this very Rājagaha. But on encountering the Dhamma & Vinaya made known by the Tathāgata, he acquired conviction, virtue, learning, relinquishment, & discernment. Having acquired conviction, virtue, learning, relinquishment, & discernment on encountering the Dhamma & Vinaya made known by the Tathāgata, now–on the break-up of the body, after death–he has reappeared in a good destination, a heavenly world, in company with the Devas of the Heaven of the Thirty-three. There he outshines the other devas both in beauty & in rank."

Then, on realizing the significance of that, the Blessed One on that occasion exclaimed:

As one with eyes & having energy would treacherous, uneven places, so a wise one, in the world of life, should avoid evil deeds.[2]

Notes

1. A Private Buddha is one who gains awakening without relying on the teachings of others, but who cannot formulate the Dhamma to teach others in the way a Full Buddha can.

2. This verse is an example of a "lamp"–a poetic figure explained in the note to Ud 1:3. In this case the lamp-word is "would/should avoid."

Ud 5:4 Boys (Kumāra Sutta)

I have heard that on one occasion the Blessed One was staying near Sāvatthī at Jeta's Grove, Anāthapiṇḍika's monastery. And on that occasion, a large number of boys on the road between Sāvatthī & Jeta's Grove were catching fish. Then early in the morning the Blessed One adjusted his under robe and–carrying his bowl & robes–went into Sāvatthī for alms. He saw the large number of boys on the road between Sāvatthī & Jeta's Grove catching little fish. Seeing them, he went up to them and, on arrival, said to them, "Boys, do you fear pain? Do you dislike pain?"

"Yes, lord, we fear pain. We dislike pain."

Then, on realizing the significance of that, the Blessed One on that occasion exclaimed:

> If you fear pain,
> if you dislike pain,
> don't anywhere do an evil deed
> in open or in secret.
> If you're doing or will do > an evil deed,
> you won't escape pain > catching up
> as you run away.

Ud 5:5 Uposatha (Uposatha Sutta)

I have heard that on one occasion the Blessed One was staying near Sāvatthī at the Eastern Monastery, the palace of Migāra's mother. And on that occasion, the Blessed One–it being the observance day–was sitting surrounded by the community of monks. Then Ven. Ānanda–when the night was far advanced, at the end of the first watch–got up from his seat, arranged his robe over one shoulder, stood facing the Blessed One, paying homage with his hands placed palm-to-palm over his heart, and said to him, "Lord, the night is far advanced. The first watch has ended. The community of monks has been sitting here long. May the Blessed One recite the Pāṭimokkha to them." When this was said, the Blessed One remained silent.

Then a second time, when the night was far advanced, at the end of the middle watch, Ven. Ānanda got up from his seat, arranged his robe over one shoulder, stood facing the Blessed One, paying homage with his hands placed palm-to-palm over his heart, and said to him, "Lord, the night is far advanced. The second watch has ended. The community of monks has been sitting here long. May the Blessed One recite the Pāṭimokkha to them." When this was said, the Blessed One remained silent.

Then a third time, when the night was far advanced, at the end of the last watch, as dawn was approaching and the face of the night was beaming, Ven. Ānanda got up from his seat, arranged his robe over one shoulder, stood facing the Blessed One, paying homage with his hands placed palm-to-palm over his heart, and said to him, "Lord, the night is far advanced. The last watch has ended. Dawn is approaching and the face of the night is beaming. The community of monks has been sitting here long. May the Blessed One recite the Pāṭimokkha to the community of monks."

"Ānanda, the gathering isn't pure."

Then the thought occurred to Ven. Mahā Moggallāna: "In reference to which individual did the Blessed One just now say, 'Ānanda, the gathering isn't pure'?" So he directed his mind, encompassing with his awareness the awareness of the entire community of monks. He saw that individual–unprincipled, evil, unclean and suspect in his undertakings, hidden in his actions, not a contemplative though claiming to be one, not leading the holy life though claiming to do so, inwardly rotten, oozing with desire, filthy by nature–sitting in the midst of the community of monks. On seeing him, he got up, went over to that individual, and on reaching him said, "Get up, friend. You have been seen by the Blessed One. You have no affiliation with the community of monks." Then the individual remained silent. A second time…. A third time, Ven. Mahā Moggallāna said, "Get up, friend. You have been seen by the Blessed One. You have no affiliation with the community of monks." And for a third time the individual remained silent.

Then Ven. Mahā Moggallāna, grabbing that individual by the arm, having expelled him through the outside door of the porch and locking the bolt, approached the Blessed One and on arrival said, "I have expelled that individual, lord. The gathering is now pure. Let the Blessed One recite the Pāṭimokkha to the community of monks."

"Isn't it amazing, Moggallāna. Isn't it astounding, how that worthless man waited until he was grabbed by the arm." Then the Blessed One addressed the monks: "From now on I will no longer perform the observance or recite the Pāṭimokkha. From now on, you alone, monks, will perform the observance and recite the Pāṭimokkha. It is impossible, it cannot happen, that a Tathāgata would perform the observance or recite the Pāṭimokkha with an impure gathering.

"Monks, there are these eight amazing & astounding qualities of the ocean because of which, as they see them again & again, the asuras take great joy in the ocean. Which eight?

"[1] The ocean has a gradual shelf, a gradual slope, a gradual inclination, with a sudden drop-off only after a long stretch.[1] The fact that the ocean has a gradual shelf, a gradual slope, a gradual inclination, with a sudden drop-off only after a long stretch: This is the first amazing & astounding quality of the ocean because of which, as they see it again & again, the asuras take great joy in the ocean.

[2] And furthermore, the ocean is stable and does not overstep its tideline…. This is the second amazing & astounding quality of the ocean because of which, as they see it again & again, the asuras take great joy in the ocean.

[3] And furthermore, the ocean does not tolerate a dead body. Any dead body in the ocean gets quickly washed to the shore and thrown up on dry land…. This is the third amazing & astounding quality of the ocean because of which, as they see it again & again, the asuras take great joy in the ocean.

[4] And furthermore, whatever great rivers there are–such as the Ganges, the Yamunā, the Aciravatī, the Sarabhū, the Mahī–on reaching the ocean, give up their former names and are classed simply as 'ocean'…. This is the fourth amazing & astounding quality of the ocean because of which, as they see it again & again, the asuras take great joy in the ocean.

[5] And furthermore, though the rivers of the world pour into the ocean, and rains fall from the sky, no swelling or diminishing in the ocean for that reason can be discerned…. This is the fifth amazing & astounding quality of the ocean because of which, as they see it again & again, the asuras take great joy in the ocean.

[6] And furthermore, the ocean has a single taste: that of salt…. This is the sixth amazing & astounding quality of the ocean because of which, as they see it again & again, the asuras take great joy in the ocean.

[7] And furthermore, the ocean has these many treasures of various kinds: pearls, sapphires, lapis lazuli, shells, quartz, coral, silver, gold, rubies, & cat's eyes…. This is the seventh amazing & astounding quality of the ocean because of which, as they see it again & again, the asuras take great joy in the ocean.

[8] And furthermore, the ocean is the abode of such mighty beings as these: whales, whale-eaters, & whale-eater-eaters; asuras, nāgas, & gandhabbas. There are in the ocean beings one hundred leagues long, two hundred… three hundred… four hundred… five hundred leagues long. The fact that the ocean is the abode of such mighty beings as these:

whales, whale-eaters, & whale-eater-eaters; asuras, nāgas, & gandhabbas; and there are in the ocean beings one hundred leagues long, two hundred… three hundred… four hundred… five hundred leagues long: This is the eighth amazing & astounding quality of the ocean because of which, as they see it again & again, the asuras take great joy in the ocean.

"These are the eight amazing & astounding qualities of the ocean because of which, as they see them again & again, the asuras take great joy in the ocean.

"In the same way, monks, there are eight amazing & astounding qualities of this Dhamma & Vinaya because of which, as they see them again & again, the monks take great joy in this Dhamma & Vinaya. Which eight?

[1] Just as the ocean has a gradual shelf, a gradual slope, a gradual inclination, with a sudden drop-off only after a long stretch; in the same way, this Dhamma & Vinaya has a gradual training, a gradual performance, a gradual practice, with a penetration to gnosis only after a long stretch. The fact that this Dhamma & Vinaya has a gradual training, a gradual performance, a gradual practice, with a penetration to gnosis only after a long stretch: This is the first amazing & astounding quality of this Dhamma & Vinaya because of which, as they see it again & again, the monks take great joy in this Dhamma & Vinaya.

[2] And furthermore, just as the ocean is stable and does not overstep its tideline; in the same way, my disciples do not–even for the sake of their lives–overstep the training rules I have formulated for them…. This is the second amazing & astounding quality of this Dhamma & Vinaya because of which, as they see it again & again, the monks take great joy in this Dhamma & Vinaya.

[3] And furthermore, just as the ocean does not tolerate a dead body–any dead body in the ocean getting quickly washed to the shore and thrown up on dry land–in the same way, if an individual is unprincipled, evil, unclean & suspect in his undertakings, hidden in his actions–not a contemplative though claiming to be one, not leading the holy life though claiming to do so, inwardly rotten, oozing with desire, filthy by nature–the community has no affiliation with him. Having quickly gathered together, they suspend him from the community. Even though he may be sitting in the midst of the community of monks, he is far from the community, and the community far from him…. This is the third amazing & astounding quality of this Dhamma & Vinaya because of which, as they see it again & again, the monks take great joy in this Dhamma & Vinaya.

[4] And furthermore, just as whatever great rivers there are–such as the Ganges, the Yamunā, the Aciravatī, the Sarabhū, the Mahī–on reaching the ocean, give up their former names and are classed simply as 'ocean'; in the same way, when members of the four castes–noble warriors, brahmans, merchants, & workers–go forth from home to the homeless life in this Dhamma & Vinaya declared by the Tathāgata, they give up their former names and clans and are classed simply as 'contemplatives, sons of the Sakyan'…. This is the fourth amazing & astounding quality of this Dhamma & Vinaya because of which, as they see it again & again, the monks take great joy in this Dhamma & Vinaya.

[5] And furthermore, just as the rivers of the world pour into the ocean, and rains fall from the sky, but no swelling or diminishing in the ocean for that reason can be discerned; in the same way, although many monks are totally unbound into the property of unbinding with no fuel remaining, no swelling or diminishing in the property of unbinding for that reason can be discerned…. This is the fifth amazing & astounding quality of this Dhamma & Vinaya because of which, as they see it again & again, the monks take great joy in this Dhamma & Vinaya.

[6] And furthermore, just as the ocean has a single taste–that of salt–in the same way, this Dhamma & Vinaya has a single taste: that of release…. This is the sixth amazing & astounding quality of this Dhamma & Vinaya because of which, as they see it again & again, the monks take great joy in this Dhamma & Vinaya.

[7] And furthermore, just as the ocean has these many treasures of various kinds–pearls, sapphires, lapis lazuli, shells, quartz, coral, silver, gold, rubies, & cat's eyes–in the same way, this Dhamma & Vinaya has these many treasures of various kinds: the four establishings of mindfulness, the four right exertions, the four bases of power, the five faculties, the five strengths, the seven factors for awakening, the noble eightfold path…. This is the seventh amazing & astounding quality of this

Dhamma & Vinaya because of which, as they see it again & again, the monks take great joy in this Dhamma & Vinaya.

[8] And furthermore, just as the ocean is the abode of such mighty beings as these: whales, whale-eaters, & whale-eater-eaters; asuras, nāgas, & gandhabbas, and there are in the ocean beings one hundred leagues long, two hundred… three hundred… four hundred… five hundred leagues long; in the same way, this Dhamma & Vinaya is the abode of such mighty beings as these: stream-winners & those practicing to realize the fruit of stream-entry; once-returners & those practicing to realize the fruit of once-returning; non-returners & those practicing to realize the fruit of non-returning; arahants & those practicing for arahantship. The fact that this Dhamma & Vinaya is the abode of such mighty beings as these–stream-winners & those practicing to realize the fruit of stream-entry; once-returners & those practicing to realize the fruit of once-returning; non-returners & those practicing to realize the fruit of non-returning; arahants & those practicing for arahantship: This is the eighth amazing & astounding quality of this Dhamma & Vinaya because of which, as they see it again & again, the monks take great joy in this Dhamma & Vinaya.

"These are the eight amazing & astounding qualities of this Dhamma & Vinaya because of which, as they see them again & again, the monks take great joy in this Dhamma & Vinaya."

Then, on realizing the significance of that, the Blessed One on that occasion exclaimed:

> Rain soddens what's covered
> & doesn't sodden what's open.
> So open up what's covered up,
> so that it won't get soddened by the rain.[2]

Notes

1. Na āyataken'eva papāto: literally, "not for quite a long stretch a sudden drop-off." The Commentary, however, insists that this phrase means, "with no abrupt drop-off." There are three reasons for not accepting the Commentary's interpretation here. (a) The first is grammatical. The word āyataka means "long, drawn out; lasting a long time." To interpret āyatakena, the instrumental of a word meaning "long, drawn out," to mean "abrupt" makes little sense. (b) The second reason is geographical. The continental shelf off the east coast of India does have a sudden drop-off after a long gradual slope. (c) The third reason is doctrinal. As noted in the interpretation of the simile, the shape of the ocean floor corresponds to the course of the practice. If there were no sudden drop-off, there would be no sudden penetration to awakening. However, there are many cases of sudden penetration in the Canon, Exhibit A being Bāhiya's attainment of arahantship in Ud 1:10.

2. This verse also appears among the verses attributed to Ven. Sirimaṇḍa at Thag 6:13 (verse 447 in the PTS edition).

Ud 5:6 Soṇa (Soṇa Sutta)

I have heard that on one occasion the Blessed One was staying near Sāvatthī at Jeta's Grove, Anāthapiṇḍika's monastery. And on that occasion Ven. Mahā Kaccāna was living among the people of Avantī on Pavatta Mountain near the Osprey Habitat. And at that time the lay follower Soṇa Koṭikaṇṇa was Ven. Mahā Kaccāna's supporter. Then as Soṇa Koṭikaṇṇa was alone in seclusion, this train of thought appeared to his awareness: "According to the Dhamma that Master Mahā Kaccāna teaches, it's not easy living at home to practice the holy life totally perfect, totally pure, like a polished shell. What if I were to shave off my hair & beard, put on the ochre robes, and go forth from the household life into homelessness?"

So he went to Ven. Mahā Kaccāna and on arrival, having bowed down to Ven. Mahā Kaccāna, sat to one side. As he was sitting there he said to Ven. Mahā Kaccāna, "Just now, venerable sir, as I was alone in seclusion, this train of thought appeared to my awareness: 'According to the Dhamma that Master Mahā Kaccāna teaches, it's not easy living at home to practice the holy life totally perfect, totally pure, like a polished shell. What if I were to shave off my hair & beard, put on the ochre robes, and go forth from the household life into homelessness?' Give me the going-forth, Master Mahā Kaccāna!"

When this was said, Ven. Mahā Kaccāna said to Soṇa Koṭikaṇṇa, "It's hard, Soṇa, the life-long, one-meal-a-day, sleeping-alone holy life. Please, right there as you are a householder, devote yourself to the message of the Awakened Ones and to the proper-time [i.e., uposatha day], one-meal-a-day, sleeping-alone holy life." And so Soṇa Koṭikaṇṇa's idea of going-forth subsided.

Then a second time as Soṇa Koṭikaṇṇa was alone in seclusion, this train of thought appeared to his awareness: "According to the Dhamma that Master Mahā Kaccāna teaches, it's not easy living at home to practice the holy life totally perfect, totally pure, like a polished shell. What if I were to shave off my hair & beard, put on the ochre robes, and go forth from the household life into homelessness?"

So he went to Ven. Mahā Kaccāna and on arrival, having bowed down to Ven. Mahā Kaccāna, sat to one side. As he was sitting there he said to Ven. Mahā Kaccāna, "Just now, venerable sir, as I was alone in seclusion, this train of thought appeared to my awareness: 'According to the Dhamma that Master Mahā Kaccāna teaches, it's not easy living at home to practice the holy life totally perfect, totally pure, like a polished shell. What if I were to shave off my hair & beard, put on the ochre robes, and go forth from the household life into homelessness?' Give me the going-forth, Master Mahā Kaccāna!"

When this was said, Ven. Mahā Kaccāna said to Soṇa Koṭikaṇṇa, "It's hard, Soṇa, the life-long, one-meal-a-day, sleeping-alone holy life. Please, right there as you are a householder, devote yourself to the message of the Awakened Ones and to the proper-time, one-meal-a-day, sleeping-alone holy life." And so Soṇa Koṭikaṇṇa's idea of going-forth subsided a second time.

Then a third time as Soṇa Koṭikaṇṇa was alone in seclusion, this train of thought appeared to his awareness: "According to the Dhamma that Master Mahā Kaccāna teaches, it's not easy living at home to practice the holy life totally perfect, totally pure, like a polished shell. What if I were to shave off my hair & beard, put on the ochre robes, and go forth from the household life into homelessness?"

So he went to Ven. Mahā Kaccāna and on arrival, having bowed down to Ven. Mahā Kaccāna, sat to one side. As he was sitting there he said to Ven. Mahā Kaccāna, "Just now, venerable sir, as I was alone in seclusion, this train of thought appeared to my awareness: 'According to the Dhamma that Master Mahā Kaccāna teaches, it's not easy living at home to practice the holy life totally perfect, totally pure, like a polished shell. What if I were to shave off my hair & beard, put on the ochre robes, and go forth from the household life into homelessness?' Give me the going-forth, Master Mahā Kaccāna!"

So Ven. Mahā Kaccāna gave Soṇa Koṭikaṇṇa the going-forth.

Now at that time the southern country of Avantī was short of monks. So only after three years–having gathered from here & there with hardship & difficulty a quorum-of-ten community of monks[1]–did Ven. Mahā Kaccāna give full admission to Ven. Soṇa. Then, after having completed the Rains retreat, as he was alone in seclusion, this train of thought appeared to Ven. Soṇa's awareness: "I haven't seen the Blessed One face-to-face. I've simply heard that he is like this and like this. If my preceptor would give me permission, I would go to see the Blessed One, worthy & rightly self-awakened."

So, leaving seclusion in the late afternoon, he went to Ven. Mahā Kaccāna and, on arrival, having bowed down to him, sat to one side. As he was sitting there, he said to Ven. Mahā Kaccāna, "Just now, venerable sir, as I was alone in seclusion, this train of thought appeared to my awareness: 'I haven't seen the Blessed One face-to-face. I've simply heard that he is like this and like this. If my preceptor would give me permission, I would go to see the Blessed One, worthy & rightly self-awakened.'"

"Good, Soṇa. Very good. Go, Soṇa, to see the Blessed One, worthy & rightly self-awakened. You will see the Blessed One who is serene & inspires serene confidence, his senses at peace, his mind at peace, one who has attained the utmost tranquility & poise, tamed, guarded, his senses restrained, a Great One (nāga). On seeing him, showing reverence with your head to his feet in my name,[2] ask whether he is free from illness & affliction, is carefree, strong, & living in comfort, [saying: 'My preceptor, lord, shows reverence with his head to your feet and asks whether you are free from illness & affliction, are carefree, strong, & living in comfort.'"][3] Saying, "As you say, venerable sir," Ven. Soṇa–delighting in & approving of Ven. Mahā Kaccāna's words–got up from his seat, bowed down to Ven. Mahā Kaccāna, circled him to the right, set his lodging in order, and–taking his bowl & robes–set off wandering toward Sāvatthī. Wandering by stages, he arrived at Sāvatthī, Jeta's Grove, Anāthapiṇḍika's monastery. He went to the Blessed One and, on arrival, having bowed down to him, sat to one side. As he was sitting there, he said to the Blessed One, "Lord, my preceptor, Ven. Mahā Kaccāna, shows reverence with his head to the Blessed One's feet and asks whether the Blessed One is free from illness & affliction, is carefree, strong, & living in comfort."

"Are you well, monk? Are you in good health? Have you come along the road with only a little fatigue? And are you not tired of alms-food?"

"I am well, Blessed One. I am in good health, Blessed One. I have come along the road, lord, with only a little fatigue and I am not tired of alms-food."

Then the Blessed One addressed Ven. Ānanda, saying, "Ānanda, prepare bedding for this visiting monk."

Then the thought occurred to Ven. Ānanda, "When the Blessed One orders me, 'Ānanda, prepare bedding for this visiting monk,' he wants to stay in the same dwelling with that monk. The Blessed One wants to stay in the same dwelling with Ven. Soṇa." So he prepared bedding for Ven. Soṇa in the dwelling in which the Blessed One was staying. Then the Blessed One, having spent much of the night sitting in the open air, washed his feet and entered the dwelling. Likewise, Ven. Soṇa, having spent much of the night sitting in the open air, washed his feet and entered the dwelling. Then, getting up toward the end of the night, the Blessed One invited Ven. Mahā Soṇa,[4] saying, "Monk, I would like you to recite the Dhamma."

Responding, "As you say, lord," to the Blessed One, Ven. Soṇa chanted all sixteen parts of the Aṭṭhaka Vagga.[5] The Blessed One, at the conclusion of Ven. Soṇa's intonation, expressed high approval: "Good, monk. Very good. You have learned the Aṭṭhaka Vagga [verses] well, have considered them well, have borne them well in mind. You have a fine delivery, clear & faultless, that makes the meaning intelligible. How many Rains [in the monkhood] do you have?"

"I have one Rains, Blessed One."

"But why did you take so long [to ordain]?"

"For a long time, lord, I have seen the drawbacks in sensuality, but the household life is confining with many duties, many things to be done."

Then, on realizing the significance of that, the Blessed One on that occasion exclaimed:

> Seeing the drawbacks of the world, > knowing the state without acquisitions,
> a noble one doesn't find joy in evil,
> in evil

a clean one doesn't find joy.[6]

Notes

1. Originally, a quorum of at least ten monks was required to ordain a new monk. In the version of this story given in the Vinaya (Mv.V.13.1-13), Ven. Mahā Kaccāna sends a request to the Buddha via Ven. Soṇa that some of the Vinaya rules be relaxed outside of the middle Ganges valley, one of them being that the quorum required for ordination be reduced. As a result, the Buddha amended the relevant rule, stating that the quorum of ten was needed only within the middle Ganges valley, and that outside of the middle Ganges valley a quorum of five would be sufficient to ordain a new monk, provided that at least one of the five be knowledgeable in the Vinaya.

2. The remainder of this paragraph does not appear in Mv.V.13.5. However, at this point in the story, Mv.V.13.5-7 inserts Ven. Mahā Kaccāna's request that Ven. Soṇa, in his name, ask the Buddha to rescind four of the monks' rules in the Southern region, and that he explain a procedure dealing with gifts of cloth that Ven. Mahā Kaccāna found unclear.

3. The passage in brackets appears in the PTS and Burmese editions, but not in the Thai and Sri Lankan editions.

4. This is the only point in the sutta where Ven. Soṇa has the prefix "Great" (Mahā) added to his name.

5. This is apparently the Aṭṭhaka Vagga as we now have it in Sn 4.

6. At Mv.V.13.10, the PTS version of this last line reads, "In the teaching a clean one finds joy." However, in the Thai, Burmese, and Sri Lankan versions of the same passage, the last line is the same as here.

Ud 5:7 Revata (Revata Sutta)

I have heard that on one occasion the Blessed One was staying near Sāvatthī at Jeta's Grove, Anāthapiṇḍika's monastery. And on that occasion Ven. Revata the Doubter was sitting not far from the Blessed One, his legs crossed, his body held erect, reflecting on [his] purification through the overcoming of doubt. The Blessed One saw Ven. Revata the Doubter sitting not far away, his legs crossed, his body held erect, reflecting on [his] purification through the overcoming of doubt.

Then, on realizing the significance of that, the Blessed One on that occasion exclaimed:

> Any doubts,
> about here or the world beyond, > about what is experienced > by/because of others, > by/because of oneself,[1] > are abandoned–all–
> by the person in jhāna, > ardent,
> living the holy life.

Note

1. This relates to the question of whether pleasure and pain are self-caused or other-caused. As Ud 6:5 and Ud 6:6 show, this question was a hot topic in the time of the Buddha. However, in SN 12:20, SN 12:35, and SN 12:67 the Buddha refuses to get involved in the issue. See the discussion in Skill in Questions, chapter 8.

Ud 5:8 Ānanda (Ānanda Sutta)

I have heard that on one occasion the Blessed One was staying near Rājagaha at the Bamboo Forest, the Squirrels' refuge. And on that occasion, early in the morning of the uposatha, Ven. Ānanda adjusted his under robe and–carrying his bowl & robes–went into Rājagaha for alms. Devadatta saw Ven. Ānanda going for alms in Rājagaha and, on seeing him, went to him. On arrival, he said to him, "From this day forward, friend Ānanda, I will conduct the uposatha & community transactions apart from the Blessed One, apart from the community of monks."

Then Ven. Ānanda–having gone for alms in Rājagaha, after the meal, returning from his alms round–went to the Blessed One and, on arrival, having bowed down to him, sat to one side. As he was sitting there he said to the Blessed One, "Just now, lord, after adjusting my under robe early in the morning and carrying my bowl & robes, I went into Rājagaha for alms. Devadatta saw me going for alms in Rājagaha and, on seeing me, went up to me. On arrival, he said to me, 'From this day forward, friend Ānanda, I will conduct the uposatha & community transactions apart from the Blessed One, apart from the community of monks.' Lord, today Devadatta will split the community. He will conduct the uposatha & community transactions [apart from the community]."

Then, on realizing the significance of that, the Blessed One on that occasion exclaimed:

> The good, for the good, is easy to do.
> The good, for the evil, is hard to do.
> Evil, for the evil, is easy to do.
> Evil, for the noble ones, is hard to do.

Ud 5:9 Jeering (Sadhāyamāna Sutta)

I have heard that on one occasion the Blessed One was wandering among the Kosalans with a large community of monks. And on that occasion, a large number of youths passed by as if jeering[1] not far from the Blessed One. The Blessed One saw the large number of youths passing by as if jeering not far away.

Then, on realizing the significance of that, the Blessed One on that occasion exclaimed:

> False pundits, totally muddled, > speaking in the range of mere words, > babbling as much as they like:
> led on by what,
> they don't know.

Note

1. Reading sadhāyamāna-rūpā with the Burmese edition. The Thai edition reads, saddāyamāna-rūpā–"as if making an uproar"–which doesn't make much sense. The Sri Lankan edition reads, saddhāyamāna-rūpā–"as if showing faith"–which makes even less sense.

Ud 5:10 Cūḷa Panthaka (Panthaka Sutta)

I have heard that on one occasion the Blessed One was staying near Sāvatthī at Jeta's Grove, Anāthapiṇḍika's monastery. And on that occasion Ven. Cūḷa Panthaka was sitting not far from the Blessed One, his legs crossed, his body held erect, with mindfulness established to the fore. The Blessed One saw Ven. Cūḷa Panthaka sitting not far away, his legs crossed, his body held erect, with mindfulness established to the fore.

Then, on realizing the significance of that, the Blessed One on that occasion exclaimed:

> With steady body,
> steady awareness,
> –whether standing, sitting, or lying down[1]– > a monk determined on mindfulness > gains one distinction
> after another.
> Having gained one distinction
> after another,
> he goes where the King of Death > can't see.

Note

1. There's a slight paradox in this verse in that the word for "steady" (ṭhita) can also mean "standing." Thus when the body is steady and unmoving, it is "standing" regardless of its posture.

6 : Blind from Birth

Ud 6:1 Relinquishment of the Life Force (Āyusama-osajjana Sutta)

I have heard that on one occasion the Blessed One was staying near Vesālī at the Gabled Hall in the Great Forest. Then, early in the morning, he adjusted his under robe and–carrying his bowl & robes–went into Vesālī for alms. Then, having gone for alms in Vesālī, after the meal, returning from his alms round, he addressed Ven. Ānanda, "Get a sitting cloth, Ānanda. We will go to the Pāvāla shrine for the day's abiding."

Responding, "As you say, lord," to the Blessed One, Ven. Ānanda followed along behind the Blessed One, carrying the sitting cloth. Then the Blessed One went to the Pāvāla shrine and, on arrival, sat down on the seat laid out.

Seated, the Blessed One addressed Ven. Ānanda, "Vesālī is refreshing, Ānanda. Refreshing, too, are the Udena shrine, the Gotamaka shrine, the Sattamba shrine, the ManySon shrine, the Sāranda shrine, the Pāvāla shrine.[1]

"Anyone, Ānanda, in whom the four bases of power[2] are developed, pursued, given a means of transport, given a grounding, steadied, consolidated, and well-undertaken, could–if he wanted–remain for an eon or the remainder of an eon.[3] In the Tathāgata, Ānanda, the four bases of power are developed, pursued, given a means of transport, given a grounding, steadied, consolidated, and well-undertaken. He could–if he wanted–remain for an eon or the remainder of an eon."

But Ven. Ānanda–even when the Blessed One had given such a blatant sign, such a blatant hint–wasn't able to understand his meaning. He didn't request of him, "Lord, may the Blessed One remain for an eon. May the One-Well-Gone remain for an eon–for the benefit of the many, for the happiness of the many, out of sympathy for the world, for the welfare, benefit, & happiness of human and divine beings." It was as if his mind was possessed by Māra.

A second time… A third time, the Blessed One addressed Ven. Ānanda, "Vesālī is refreshing, Ānanda. Refreshing, too, are the Udena shrine, the Gotamaka shrine, the Sattamba shrine, the ManySon shrine, the Sāranda shrine, the Pāvāla shrine.

"Anyone, Ānanda, in whom the four bases of power are developed, pursued, given a means of transport, given a grounding, steadied, consolidated, and well-undertaken, could–if he wanted–remain for an eon or the remainder of an eon. In the Tathāgata, Ānanda, the four bases of power are developed, pursued, given a means of transport, given a grounding, steadied, consolidated, and well-undertaken. He could–if he wanted–remain for an eon or the remainder of an eon."

But Ven. Ānanda–even when the Blessed One had given such a blatant sign, such a blatant hint–wasn't able to understand his meaning. He didn't request of him, "Lord, may the Blessed One remain for an eon. May the One-Well-Gone remain for an eon–for the benefit of the many, for the happiness of the many, out of sympathy for the world, for the welfare, benefit, & happiness of human and divine beings." It was as if his mind was possessed by Māra.

Then the Blessed One addressed Ven. Ānanda, "Go, Ānanda. Do what you think it is now time to do."

Responding, "As you say, lord," to the Blessed One, Ven. Ānanda got up from his seat, bowed down to the Blessed One and–after circling him to the right–went to sit under a tree not far from the Blessed One.

Then, not long after Ven. Ānanda had left, Māra the Evil One went to the Blessed One and, on arrival, stood to one side. As he was standing there he said to the Blessed One, "May the Blessed One totally unbind now, lord. May the One-Well-Gone totally unbind now, lord. Now is the time for the Blessed One's total unbinding, lord. After all, these words were said by the Blessed One: 'Evil One, I will not totally unbind as long as my monk disciples are not yet experienced, trained, attained to confidence, desiring rest from the yoke, learned, maintaining the Dhamma, practicing the Dhamma in line with the Dhamma, practicing masterfully, living in line with the Dhamma; declaring the Dhamma–after having learned it from their own teachers–teaching it, describing it, setting it forth, revealing it, explaining it, making it plain; well-refuting, in line with the Dhamma, any opposing teachings that have arisen; teaching the Dhamma with its marvels.'[4]

"But now, lord, the Blessed One's monk disciples are experienced, trained, attained to confidence, desiring rest from the yoke, learned, maintaining the Dhamma, practicing the Dhamma in line with the Dhamma, practicing masterfully, living in line with the Dhamma; declaring the Dhamma–after having learned it from their own teachers–teaching it, describing it, setting it forth, revealing it, explaining it, making it plain; well-refuting, in line with the Dhamma, any opposing teachings that have arisen; teaching the Dhamma with its marvels.

"May the Blessed One totally unbind now, lord. May the One-Well-Gone totally unbind now, lord. Now is the time for the Blessed One's total unbinding, lord. After all, these words were said by the Blessed One: 'Evil One, I will not totally unbind as long as my nun disciples… my male lay-follower disciples… my female lay-follower disciples are not yet experienced, trained, attained to maturity, desiring rest from the yoke, learned, maintaining the Dhamma, practicing the Dhamma in line with the Dhamma, practicing masterfully, living in line with the Dhamma; declaring the Dhamma–after having learned it from their own teachers–teaching it, describing it, setting it forth, revealing it, explaining it, making it plain; well-refuting, in line with the Dhamma, any opposing teachings that have arisen; teaching the Dhamma with its marvels.'

"But now, lord, the Blessed One's female lay-follower disciples are experienced, trained, attained to maturity, desiring rest from the yoke, learned, maintaining the Dhamma, practicing the Dhamma in line with the Dhamma, practicing masterfully, living in line with the Dhamma; declaring the Dhamma–after having learned it from their own teachers–teaching it, describing it, setting it forth, revealing it, explaining it, making it plain; well-refuting, in line with the Dhamma, any opposing teachings that have arisen; teaching the Dhamma with its marvels.

"May the Blessed One totally unbind now, lord. May the One-Well-Gone totally unbind now, lord. Now is the time for the Blessed One's total unbinding, lord. After all, these words were said by the Blessed One: 'Evil One, I will not totally unbind as long as this holy life of mine is not powerful, prosperous, widely-spread, disseminated among many people, well-expounded as far as there are devas & human beings.' But now, lord, the Blessed One's holy life is powerful, prosperous, widely-spread, disseminated among many people, well-expounded as far as there are devas & human beings.

"May the Blessed One totally unbind now, lord. May the One-Well-Gone totally unbind now, lord. Now is the time for the Blessed One's total unbinding, lord."

When this was said, the Blessed One said to Māra, the Most Evil One: "Relax, Evil One. It won't be long until the Tathāgata's total unbinding. In three months' time from now, the Tathāgata will totally unbind."

Thus at the Pāvāla shrine–mindful & alert–the Blessed One relinquished the fabrications of life.[5] And as the Blessed One relinquished the fabrications of life, there was a great earthquake, frightening & hair-raising, along with cracks of thunder.

Then, on realizing the significance of that, the Blessed One on that occasion exclaimed:

> Comparing the incomparable[6] > with coming-into-being,
> the sage relinquished > the fabrication of becoming.
> Inwardly joyful,
> centered,
> he split his own > coming-into-being > like a coat of mail.[7]

Notes

1. As DN 16 makes clear, there were several times in the past where the Buddha, at several different locations, had commented to Ven. Ānanda on how refreshing it was to be in the location where they were staying. This apparently was meant as a sign that living on would not be a burden, for in each case he had then given a broad hint–as he does here–for Ven. Ānanda to invite him to extend his life. As says in the narrative immediately following the events portrayed in this udāna, he would have refused the invitation if offered only twice, but would have accepted it on the third offer. But now that he has abandoned the will to live, he cannot take it on again, so Ven. Ānanda's final opportunity to make the invitation is lost.

2. "And what is the base of power? Whatever path, whatever practice, leads to the attainment of power, the winning of power: That is called the base of power.

"And what is the development of the base of power? There is the case where a monk develops the base of power endowed with concentration founded on desire & the fabrications of exertion. He develops the base of power endowed with concentration founded on persistence… concentration founded on intent… concentration founded on discrimination & the fabrications of exertion. This is called the development of the base of power." – SN 51:26

3. An eon, in the Buddhist cosmology, is an immensely long stretch of time. According to the Commentary here, it can also mean the full lifespan of a human being in that particular period of the eon (Buddhist cosmology allows for a huge fluctuation in human lifespans over the course of an eon). The Commentary adopts this second meaning in this passage, and so takes the Buddha's statement here as meaning that a person who has developed the bases of power could live for a full lifespan or for a little bit more. In this case, the Pali for the last part of this compound, kappāvasesaṁ, would mean, "an eon plus a remainder."

4. DN 11 defines the miracle of instruction as instruction in training the mind to the point of where it gains release from all suffering and stress.

5. In other words, the Buddha relinquished the will to live longer. It was this relinquishment that led to his total Unbinding three months later.

6. Reading tulaṁ as a present participle.

7. The image is of splitting a coat of mail with an arrow.

Ud 6:2 Seclusion (Paṭisalla Sutta)

I have heard that on one occasion the Blessed One was staying near Sāvatthī at the Eastern Monastery, the palace of Migāra's mother. And on that occasion the Blessed One, having emerged from his seclusion in the late afternoon, was sitting outside the doorway of the porch. Then King Pasenadi Kosala went to the Blessed One and, on arrival, having bowed down to him, sat to one side.

Now on that occasion seven coiled-hair ascetics, seven Jain ascetics, seven cloth-less ascetics, seven one-cloth ascetics, & seven wanderers–their nails, armpit-hair, & body-hair grown long, carrying containers on poles [over their shoulders]–walked past, not far from the Blessed One. King Pasenadi Kosala saw the seven coiled-hair ascetics, seven Jain ascetics, seven cloth-less ascetics, seven one-cloth ascetics, & seven wanderers–their nails, armpit-hair, & body-hair grown long, carrying containers on poles [over their shoulders]–walking past, not far from the Blessed One. On seeing them, he got up from his seat, arranged his upper robe over one shoulder, knelt down with his right knee on the ground, paid homage to the seven coiled-hair ascetics, seven Jain ascetics, seven cloth-less ascetics, seven one-cloth ascetics, & seven wanderers with his hands palm-to-palm in front his heart, and announced his name three times: "I am the king, venerable sirs, Pasenadi Kosala. I am the king, venerable sirs, Pasenadi Kosala. I am the king, venerable sirs, Pasenadi Kosala."

Then not long after the seven coiled-hair ascetics, seven Jain ascetics, seven cloth-less ascetics, seven one-cloth ascetics, & seven wanderers had passed, King Pasenadi Kosala went to the Blessed One and, on arrival, having bowed down to him, sat to one side. As he was sitting there he said to the Blessed One, "Of those in the world who are arahants or on the path to arahantship, are these among them?"

"Great king, as a layman enjoying sensual pleasures; living confined with children; using Kāsī fabrics & sandalwood; wearing garlands, scents, & creams; handling gold & silver, it's hard for you to know whether these are arahants or on the path to arahantship.

"It's through living together that a person's virtue may be known, and then only after a long period, not a short period; by one who is attentive, not by one who is inattentive; by one who is discerning, not by one who is not discerning.

"It's through trading with a person that his purity may be known, and then only after a long period, not a short period; by one who is attentive, not by one who is inattentive; by one who is discerning, not by one who is not discerning.

"It's through adversity that a person's endurance may be known, and then only after a long period, not a short period; by one who is attentive, not by one who is inattentive; by one who is discerning, not by one who is not discerning.

"It's through discussion that a person's discernment may be known, and then only after a long period, not a short period; by one who is attentive, not by one who is inattentive; by one who is discerning, not by one who is not discerning."

"Amazing, lord! Astounding!–how well that was put by the Blessed One! 'Great king, as a layman enjoying sensual pleasures; living confined with children; using Kāsī fabrics & sandalwood; wearing garlands, scents, & creams; handling gold & silver, it's hard for you to know whether these are arahants or on the path to arahantship.

"'It's through living together that a person's virtue may be known, and then only after a long period, not a short period; by one who is attentive, not by one who is inattentive; by one who is discerning, not by one who is not discerning.

"'It's through trading with a person that his purity may be known, and then only after a long period, not a short period; by one who is attentive, not by one who is inattentive; by one who is discerning, not by one who is not discerning.

"'It's through adversity that a person's endurance may be known, and then only after a long period, not a short period; by one who is attentive, not by one who is inattentive; by one who is discerning, not by one who is not discerning.

"'It's through discussion that a person's discernment may be known, and then only after a long period, not a short period; by one who is attentive, not by one who is inattentive; by one who is discerning, not by one who is not discerning.'

"These men, lord, are my spies, my scouts, returning after going out through the countryside. They go out first, and then I go. Now, when they have scrubbed off the dirt & mud, are well-bathed & well-perfumed, have trimmed their hair and beards, and have put on white clothes, they will go about endowed and provided with the five strings of sensuality."

Then, on realizing the significance of that, the Blessed One on that occasion exclaimed:

One
should not make an effort everywhere, should not be another's hireling, should not live dependent on another, should not go about as a trader in the Dhamma.[1]

Notes

1. SN 3:11 tells a nearly identical version of this story, although it replaces this verse with the following:

Not by appearance
is a man rightly known, nor should trust be based on a quick glance,
–for, disguised as well-restrained,
the unrestrained go through this world.
A counterfeit earring made of clay,
a bronze half-dollar coated in gold:
They go about in this world hidden all around:
impure inside,

beautiful out.

The verse in SN 3:11 may seem more immediately relevant to the situation than the verse given here, but the verse given here is a more interesting and original response to what is happening.

Ud 6:3 It Was (Ahu Sutta)

I have heard that on one occasion the Blessed One was staying near Sāvatthī at Jeta's Grove, Anāthapiṇḍika's monastery. And on that occasion the Blessed One sat reflecting on the various evil, unskillful qualities that had been abandoned [in him] and on the various skillful qualities that had gone to the culmination of their development. Then as he realized the various evil, unskillful qualities that had been abandoned [in him] and the various skillful qualities that had gone to the culmination of their development, he on that occasion exclaimed:

> Before, it was, then it wasn't.
> Before, it wasn't, then it was.
> It wasn't, won't be,
> & now isn't to be found.[1]

Note

1. The last half of this verse also appears as the last half a verse attributed to Ven. Kaṇhadinna at Thag 2:30 (verse 180 in the PTS edition). According to the Commentary, these lines refer to the moment of the path to arahantship, which occurs only once and is never repeated.

Ud 6:4 Sectarians (1) (Tittha Sutta)

I have heard that on one occasion the Blessed One was staying near Sāvatthī at Jeta's Grove, Anāthapiṇḍika's monastery. And on that occasion there were many contemplatives, brahmans, & wanderers of various sects living around Sāvatthī with differing views, differing opinions, differing beliefs, dependent for support on their differing views. Some of the contemplatives & brahmans held this doctrine, this view: "The cosmos is eternal. Only this is true; anything otherwise is worthless."

Some of the contemplatives & brahmans held this doctrine, this view: "The cosmos is not eternal" … "The cosmos is finite" … "The cosmos is infinite" … "The soul is the same thing as the body" … "The soul is one thing and the body another" … "After death a Tathāgata exists" … "After death a Tathāgata does not exist" … "After death a Tathāgata both exists & does not exist" … "After death a Tathāgata neither exists nor does not exist. Only this is true; anything otherwise is worthless."

And they kept on arguing, quarreling, & disputing, wounding one another with weapons of the mouth, saying, "The Dhamma is like this, it's not like that. The Dhamma's not like that, it's like this."

Then in the early morning, a large number of monks adjusted their under robes and–carrying their bowls & robes–went into Sāvatthī for alms. Having gone for alms in Sāvatthī, after the meal, returning from their alms round, they went to the Blessed One and, on arrival, having bowed down to him, sat to one side. As they were sitting there, they said to the Blessed One, "Lord, there are many contemplatives, brahmans, & wanderers of various sects living around Sāvatthī with differing views, differing opinions, differing beliefs, dependent for support on their differing views…. And they keep on arguing, quarreling, & disputing, wounding one another with weapons of the mouth, saying, 'The Dhamma is like this, it's not like that. The Dhamma's not like that, it's like this.'"

"Monks, the wanderers of other sects are blind & eyeless. They don't know what is beneficial and what is harmful. They don't know what is the Dhamma and what is non-Dhamma. Not knowing what is beneficial and what is harmful, not knowing what is Dhamma and what is non-Dhamma, they keep on arguing, quarreling, & disputing, wounding one another with weapons of the mouth, saying, 'The Dhamma is like this, it's not like that. The Dhamma's not like that, it's like this.'

"Once, monks, in this same Sāvatthī, there was a certain king, and the king said to a certain man, 'Come, my good man. Gather together all the people in Sāvatthī who have been blind from birth.'"

"Responding, 'As you say, your majesty,' to the king, the man–having rounded up all the people in Sāvatthī who had been blind from birth–went to the king and on arrival said, 'Your majesty, the people in Sāvatthī who have been blind from birth have been gathered together.'

"'Very well then, I say, show the blind people an elephant.'

"Responding, 'As you say, your majesty,' to the king, the man showed the blind people an elephant. To some of the blind people he showed the elephant's head, saying, 'This, blind people, is what an elephant is like.' To some of them he showed the elephant's ear, saying, 'This, blind people, is what an elephant is like.' To some of them he showed the elephant's tusk… the elephant's trunk… the elephant's body… the elephant's foot… the elephant's hindquarters… the elephant's tail… the tuft at the end of the elephant's tail, saying, 'This, blind people, is what an elephant is like.'

"Then, having shown the blind people the elephant, the man went to the king and on arrival said, 'Your majesty, the blind people have seen the elephant. May your majesty do what you think it is now time to do.'

"Then the king went to the blind people and on arrival asked them, 'Blind people, have you seen the elephant?'

"'Yes, your majesty. We have seen the elephant.'

"'Now tell me, blind people, what the elephant is like.'

"The blind people who had been shown the elephant's head said, 'The elephant, your majesty, is just like a jar.'

"Those who had been shown the elephant's ear said, 'The elephant, your majesty, is just like a winnowing basket.'

"Those who had been shown the elephant's tusk said, 'The elephant, your majesty, is just like a plowshare.'[1]

"Those who had been shown the elephant's trunk said, 'The elephant, your majesty, is just like the pole of a plow.'

"Those who had been shown the elephant's body said, 'The elephant, your majesty, is just like a granary.'

"Those who had been shown the elephant's foot said, 'The elephant, your majesty, is just like a post.'

"Those who had been shown the elephant's hindquarters said, 'The elephant, your majesty, is just like a mortar.'

"Those who had been shown the elephant's tail said, 'The elephant, your majesty, is just like a pestle.'

"Those who had been shown the tuft at the end of the elephant's tail said, 'The elephant, your majesty, is just like a broom.'

"Saying, 'The elephant is like this, it's not like that. The elephant's not like that, it's like this,' they struck one another with their fists. That gratified the king.

"In the same way, monks, the wanderers of other sects are blind & eyeless. They don't know what is beneficial and what is harmful. They don't know what is the Dhamma and what is non-Dhamma. Not knowing what is beneficial and what is harmful, not knowing what is Dhamma and what is non-Dhamma, they keep on arguing, quarreling, & disputing, wounding one another with weapons of the mouth, saying, 'The Dhamma is like this, it's not like that. The Dhamma's not like that, it's like this.'"

Then, on realizing the significance of that, the Blessed One on that occasion exclaimed:

> With regard to these things
> they're attached–
> some contemplatives & brahmans.
> They quarrel & fight– > people seeing one side.

Note

1. Reading phālo with the Thai and Sri Lankan editions. According to the PTS dictionary, this word can also mean "iron rod." The Burmese edition reads, khīlo, "post" or "stake." The Thai edition also includes another variant reading: sallo, "arrow."

I have heard that on one occasion the Blessed One was staying near Sāvatthī at Jeta's Grove, Anāthapiṇḍika's monastery. And on that occasion there were many contemplatives, brahmans, & wanderers of various sects living around Sāvatthī with differing views, differing opinions, differing beliefs, dependent for support on their differing views. "Pleasure & pain, the self & the cosmos are self-made" … "other-made" … "both self-made & other-made" … "Pleasure & pain, the self & the cosmos–without self-making, without other-making–are spontaneously arisen. Only this is true; anything otherwise is worthless."

Then, on realizing the significance of that, the Blessed One on that occasion exclaimed:

> With regard to these things
> they're attached–
> some contemplatives & brahmans.
> Not reaching the footing,[1] > they sink in mid-stream.

Note

1. This compound–tamogadhaṁ–is ambiguous in that it can be divided in two ways: tam-ogadhaṁ, "that footing"; or tamo-gadhaṁ, "a footing in darkness." The first is the meaning apparently intended here, with "that footing" referring to the deathless (the image is of the point, when crossing a river, where one comes close enough to the far shore that one can touch bottom–see AN 10:58). However, the Buddha was probably conscious that the compound could also be interpreted in the second way, which would have made the term memorable for its shock value. There are several other passages in Pali poetry where terms seem to have been intended to carry both positive and negative meanings for this reason. See, for example, Dhp 97, Sn 4:10, and Sn 4:13.

Then, on realizing the significance of that, the Blessed One on that occasion exclaimed:

People are intent on the idea of
    'I-making'
and attached to the idea of 'other-making.'
Some don't realize this,
nor do they see it as an arrow.
But to one who,
having extracted this arrow, sees,
[the thought] 'I am doing,'[1] doesn't occur;
'Another is doing,' doesn't occur.
This human race is possessed by conceit
            bound by conceit,
            tied down by conceit.
Speaking hurtfully because of their views they don't go beyond
    the wandering-on.

Ud 6:7 Subhūti (Subhūti Sutta)

I have heard that on one occasion the Blessed One was staying near Sāvatthī at Jeta's Grove, Anāthapiṇḍika's monastery. And on that occasion Ven. Subhūti was sitting not far from the Blessed One, his legs crossed, his body held erect, having attained a concentration free from directed thought. The Blessed One saw Ven. Subhūti sitting not far away, his legs crossed, his body held erect, having attained a concentration free from directed thought.

Then, on realizing the significance of that, the Blessed One on that occasion exclaimed:

> Whose thoughts are > vaporized,
> well-dealt-with > within,[1]
> without trace–
> going beyond that tie, > perceiving the formless, > overcoming > four yokes,[2]
> one doesn't go
> to birth.

Notes

1. This part of the verse is identical with the first half of a verse in Sn 1:1 (verse 7 in the PTS edition).

2. The four yokes are: sensuality, becoming, views, and ignorance. See AN 4:10.

Ud 6:8 The Courtesan (Gaṇika Sutta)

I have heard that on one occasion the Blessed One was staying near Rājagaha at the Bamboo Forest, the Squirrels' Sanctuary. And on that occasion two factions in Rājagaha were infatuated with a certain courtesan, their minds enthralled. Arguing, quarreling, & disputing, they attacked one another with fists, attacked one another with clods of dirt, attacked one another with sticks, attacked one another with knives, so that they fell into death or death-like pain.

Then in the early morning, a large number of monks adjusted their under robes and–carrying their bowls & robes–went into Rājagaha for alms. Having gone for alms in Rājagaha, after the meal, returning from their alms round, they went to the Blessed One and, on arrival, having bowed down to him, sat to one side. As they were sitting there, they said to the Blessed One, "At present, two factions in Rājagaha are infatuated with a certain courtesan, their minds enthralled. Arguing, quarreling, & disputing, they attack one another with fists, attack one another with clods of dirt, attack one another with sticks, attack one another with knives, so that they fall into death or death-like pain."

Then, on realizing the significance of that, the Blessed One on that occasion exclaimed:

> What's been attained, what's to be attained, > are both strewn with dust > by one who trains
> in line with the afflicted.
> Any precept & practice life whose essence is training, > and the holy life whose essence is service:
> This is one extreme.
> Any who say, "There's no harm in sensual desires":
> This, the second extreme.
> Both of these extremes cause the growth of cemeteries, > and cemeteries cause views to grow.

Not directly knowing these two extremes, some fall short,
some run too far.[1]
But those who, directly knowing them, didn't exist there,
didn't construe
by means of them:[2]
For them
there's no whirling through the cycle to be described.

Notes

1. See Iti 49, and the discussion of this point in The Paradox of Becoming, chapters 2 and 6.

2. For an example of "not existing there," see the Buddha's instructions to Bāhiya in Ud 1:10. For an example of freeing oneself from construing, see the description of a sage at peace near the conclusion of MN 140.

Ud 6:9 Rushing (Upāti Sutta)

I have heard that on one occasion the Blessed One was staying near Sāvatthī at Jeta's Grove, Anāthapiṇḍika's monastery. Now on that occasion, in the pitch-black darkness of the night, the Blessed One was sitting in the open air while oil lamps were burning. And on that occasion, many flying insects, flying into & around those lamps, were meeting their downfall, meeting their misfortune, meeting their downfall & misfortune in those oil lamps. The Blessed One saw those flying insects, flying into & around those lamps, meeting their downfall, meeting their misfortune, meeting their downfall & misfortune in those oil lamps.

Then, on realizing the significance of that, the Blessed One on that occasion exclaimed:

> Rushing headlong,
> missing what's essential, > bringing on one new bond
> after another,
> they fall, like insects into a flame:
> those intent
> on things seen,
> things heard.

Ud 6:10 They Appear (Uppajjanti Sutta)

I have heard that on one occasion the Blessed One was staying near Sāvatthī at Jeta's Grove, Anāthapiṇḍika's monastery. Then Ven. Ānanda went to the Blessed One and, on arrival, having bowed down to him, sat to one side. As he was sitting there he said to the Blessed One, "Lord, as long as Tathāgatas–worthy & rightly self-awakened–do not appear in the world, that's when the wanderers of other sects are worshipped, revered, honored, venerated, and given homage–recipients of robes, alms food, lodgings, & medicinal requisites for the sick. But when Tathāgatas–worthy & rightly self-awakened–appear in the world, that's when the wanderers of other sects are not worshipped, revered, honored, venerated, or given homage; nor are they recipients of robes, alms food, lodgings, & medicinal requisites for the sick. Now only the Blessed One is worshipped, revered, honored, venerated, and given homage–a recipient of robes, alms food, lodgings, & medicinal requisites for the sick–along with the community of monks."

"That's how it is, Ānanda. That's how it is. As long as Tathāgatas–worthy & rightly self-awakened–do not appear in the world, that's when the wanderers of other sects are worshipped, revered, honored, venerated, and given homage–recipients of robes, alms food, lodgings, & medicinal requisites for the sick. But when Tathāgatas–worthy & rightly self-awakened–appear in the world, that's when the wanderers of other sects are not worshipped, revered, honored, venerated, or given homage; nor are they recipients of robes, alms food, lodgings, & medicinal requisites for the sick. Now only the Tathāgata is worshipped, revered, honored, venerated, and given homage–a recipient of robes, alms food, lodgings, & medicinal requisites for the sick–along with the community of monks."

Then, on realizing the significance of that, the Blessed One on that occasion exclaimed:

> The glowworm shines
> as long as the sun hasn't risen.

But when that splendor rises,
the glowworm's light is destroyed.
    It no longer shines.
Likewise, sectarians[1] shine as long as those rightly awakened don't appear in the world.
Those logicians[2] aren't purified, nor are their disciples.
Those of bad views aren't released
    from stress.

Notes

1. Reading titthiyānaṁ with the Thai edition. The Sri Lankan and Burmese editions read, takkikānaṁ, "logicians." The parallel passage in the Udānavarga (29.2) agrees with this latter version.

2. In DN 1, the Buddha criticizes the philosophies of many of his contemporaries for having been "hammered out by logic."

7 : The Minor Section

Ud 7:1 Bhaddiya (1) (Bhaddiya Sutta)

I have heard that on one occasion the Blessed One was staying near Sāvatthī at Jeta's Grove, Anāthapiṇḍika's monastery. At that time Ven. Sāriputta was–with a variety of approaches–instructing, urging, rousing, & encouraging Ven. Bhaddiya the Dwarf with Dhamma-talk. As Ven. Bhaddiya the Dwarf was–with a variety of approaches–being instructed, urged, roused, & encouraged by Ven. Sāriputta with Dhamma-talk, his mind, through lack of clinging/sustenance, was released from the effluents.

The Blessed One saw that as Ven. Bhaddiya the Dwarf was–with a variety of approaches–being instructed, urged, roused, & encouraged by Ven. Sāriputta with Dhamma-talk, his mind, through lack of clinging/sustenance, was released from the effluents.

Then, on realizing the significance of that, the Blessed One on that occasion exclaimed:

> Above, below, everywhere released, > he doesn't focus on "I am this."[1] > Thus released, he crosses the flood > not crossed before,
> for the sake of no further becoming.

Note

1. See Ud 1:1, note 3.

Ud 7:2 Bhaddiya (2) (Bhaddiya Sutta)

I have heard that on one occasion the Blessed One was staying near Sāvatthī at Jeta's Grove, Anāthapiṇḍika's monastery. At that time Ven. Sāriputta was–with a variety of approaches–instructing, urging, rousing, & encouraging Ven. Bhaddiya the Dwarf with Dhamma-talk to an even greater extent, as he thought that Bhaddiya was still just a learner.

The Blessed One saw that Ven. Sāriputta was–with a variety of approaches–instructing, urging, rousing, & encouraging Ven. Bhaddiya the Dwarf with Dhamma-talk to an even greater extent, as he thought that Bhaddiya was still just a learner.

Then, on realizing the significance of that, the Blessed One on that occasion exclaimed:

> He has cut the cycle, > has gone away
> to freedom from longing.
> The dried-up stream
> no longer flows.
> The cycle, cut,
> no longer turns.
> This, just this,
> is the end of stress.

Ud 7:3 Attached to Sensual Pleasures (1) (Kāmesu Satta Sutta)

I have heard that on one occasion the Blessed One was staying near Sāvatthī at Jeta's Grove, Anāthapiṇḍika's monastery. And on that occasion, most of the people in Sāvatthī were excessively attached to sensual pleasures. They lived infatuated with, greedy for, addicted to, fastened to, absorbed in sensual pleasures. Then in the early morning, a large number of monks adjusted their under robes and–carrying their bowls & robes–went into Sāvatthī for alms. Having gone for alms in Sāvatthī, after the meal, returning from their alms round, they went to the Blessed One and, on arrival, having bowed down to him, sat to one side. As they were sitting there, they said to the Blessed One, "Most of the people in Sāvatthī are excessively attached to sensual pleasures. They live infatuated with, greedy for, addicted to, fastened to, absorbed in sensual pleasures."

Then, on realizing the significance of that, the Blessed One on that occasion exclaimed:

> Attached to sensual pleasures, > attached to sensual ties, > seeing no blame in the fetter, > never will those attached to the fetter, the tie, > cross over the flood
> so great & wide.

Ud 7:4 Attached to Sensual Pleasures (2) (Kāmesu Satta Sutta)

I have heard that on one occasion the Blessed One was staying near Sāvatthī at Jeta's Grove, Anāthapiṇḍika's monastery. And on that occasion, most of the people in Sāvatthī were excessively attached to sensual pleasures. They lived infatuated with, greedy for, addicted to, fastened to, absorbed in sensual pleasures. Then early in the morning the Blessed One adjusted his under robe and–carrying his bowl & robes–went into Sāvatthī for alms. He saw that most of the people in Sāvatthī were excessively attached to sensual pleasures, that they live infatuated with, greedy for, addicted to, fastened to, absorbed in sensual pleasures.

Then, on realizing the significance of that, the Blessed One on that occasion exclaimed:

> Blinded by sensuality
> covered by the net,
> veiled with the veil of craving,
> bound by the Kinsman of the heedless,[1]
> like fish in the mouth of a trap,[2] > they go to aging & death, > like a milk-drinking calf to its mother.

Notes

1. Māra. There is an alliterative play here between the word "bound" (bandhā) and "by the Kinsman" (bandhunā).

2. This verse, up to this point, is identical with a verse attributed to Ven. Rāhula in Thag 4:8 (verse 297 in the PTS edition).

Ud 7:5 The Dwarf (Lakuṇṭha Sutta)

I have heard that on one occasion the Blessed One was staying near Sāvatthī at Jeta's Grove, Anāthapiṇḍika's monastery. And on that occasion Ven. Bhaddiya the Dwarf, following behind a large number of monks, was going to the Blessed One. From afar, the Blessed One saw Ven. Bhaddiya the Dwarf coming, following behind a large number of monks: ugly, unsightly, stunted, treated with condescension[1] by most of the monks. On seeing him, the Blessed One addressed the monks, "Monks, do you see that monk coming from afar, following behind a large number of monks: ugly, unsightly, stunted, treated with condescension by most of the monks?"

"Yes, lord."

"That, monks, is a monk of great power, great might. The attainment already attained by that monk is not of a sort easily attained. And by means of it he has reached & remains in the supreme goal of the holy life for which clansmen rightly go forth from home into homelessness, knowing & realizing it for himself right in the here-&-now."

Then, on realizing the significance of that, the Blessed One on that occasion exclaimed:

> Faultless,
> canopied in white,
> the single-spoked chariot rolls along.
> See him coming, untroubled:
> one whose stream is cut,
> free from bonds.[2]

Notes

1. The Commentary notes that misbehaving monks liked to stroke his hands and catch hold of his ears.

2. In SN 41:5, Citta the householder explains this verse as follows:

"Faultless stands for virtues.

"Canopied in white stands for release.

"Single-spoked stands for mindfulness.

"Rolls along stands for coming and going.

"Chariot stands for this body composed of the four elements….

"Passion is a trouble; aversion is a trouble; delusion is a trouble. These have been abandoned by a monk whose effluents have ended–their root destroyed, made like a palmyra stump, deprived of the conditions of development, not destined for future arising. That's why the monk whose effluents have ended is said to be untroubled.

"Him coming stands for the arahant.

"Stream stands for craving. That has been abandoned by a monk whose effluents have ended–its root destroyed, made like a palmyra stump, deprived of the conditions of development, not destined for future arising. That's why the monk whose effluents have ended is said to be one whose stream is cut.

"Passion is a bond; aversion is a bond; delusion is a bond. These have been abandoned by a monk whose effluents have ended–their root destroyed, made like a palmyra stump, deprived of the conditions of development, not destined for future arising. That's why the monk whose effluents have ended is said to be free from bonds."

SN 21:6 starts with the same prose passage as this udāna but ends with a different verse:

> Swans, cranes, & peacocks, > elephants & spotted antelope > all fear the lion > (though) in body there's no comparison.
> In the same way, among human beings, > even if one is small > but endowed in discernment, > one is great for that– > not the fool endowed in physique.

Ud 7:6 The Ending of Craving (Taṇhākhaya Sutta)

I have heard that on one occasion the Blessed One was staying near Sāvatthī at Jeta's Grove, Anāthapiṇḍika's monastery. And on that occasion Ven. Aññāta Koṇḍañña[1] was sitting not far from the Blessed One, his legs crossed, his body held erect, reflecting on [his] release through the total ending of craving. The Blessed One saw Ven. Aññāta Koṇḍañña sitting not far away, his legs crossed, his body held erect, reflecting on [his] release through the total ending of craving.

Then, on realizing the significance of that, the Blessed One on that occasion exclaimed:

> For someone with no root, no soil, no leaves > –how creepers?
> Who's fit to criticize him?– > the enlightened one freed > from bonds.
> Even devas praise him.
> Even by Brahmā he's praised.

Note

1. The Buddha's first disciple. See SN 56:11.

Ud 7:7 The Ending of Objectification (Papañcakhaya Sutta)

I have heard that on one occasion the Blessed One was staying near Sāvatthī at Jeta's Grove, Anāthapiṇḍika's monastery. And on that occasion the Blessed One was sitting, contemplating his own abandoning of the perceptions & categories of objectification.

Then the Blessed One, realizing his own abandoning of the perceptions & categories of objectification, on that occasion exclaimed:

> One who > has no objectifications,[1] > no standing-place,[2]
> who has gone beyond
> the tether & cross-bar:
> The world, even with its devas, > doesn't look down on him– > he, going about without craving,
> a sage.

Notes

1. Papañca: A mode of thought that begins with the assumption, "I am the thinker," and develops its categories and perceptions–about self and world, about existence and non-existence–from there. For more on this topic, see the introduction to MN 18 and Skill in Questions, chapters 3 and 8.

2. On the teaching that the awakened person has no location, see The Paradox of Becoming, chapter 7.

Ud 7:8 Kaccāna (Kaccāna Sutta)

I have heard that on one occasion the Blessed One was staying near Sāvatthī at Jeta's Grove, Anāthapiṇḍika's monastery. Now at that time Ven. Mahā Kaccāna was sitting not far from the Blessed One, his legs crossed, his body held erect, having mindfulness immersed in the body well-established to the fore within. The Blessed One saw Ven. Mahā Kaccāna sitting not far away, his legs crossed, his body held erect, having mindfulness immersed in the body well-established to the fore within.

Then, on realizing the significance of that, the Blessed One on that occasion exclaimed:

> If one were to have > mindfulness always > established, continually > immersed in the body, > (thinking,)
> "It should not be,
> it should not be mine;
> it will not be,
> it will not be mine"[1]–
> there,
> in that step-by-step dwelling, > one in no long time > would cross over > attachment.

Note

1. This passage can also be translated as:

> "It should not be,
> it should not occur to me;
> it will not be,

it will not occur to me."

In AN 10:29, the Buddha recommends this view as conducive to developing dispassion for becoming. However, in MN 106 he warns that it can lead to the refined equanimity of the dimension of neither perception nor non-perception, which can become an object of clinging. Only if that subtle clinging is detected can all clinging be abandoned.

The Canon's most extended discussion of this theme of meditation is in SN 22:55. See Appendix Two.

For more on this topic, see The Paradox of Becoming, chapter 5.

Ud 7:9 The Well (Udapāna Sutta)

I have heard that on one occasion the Blessed One was wandering among the Mallans, together with a large community of monks, and came to a brahman village of the Mallans named Thūna. The brahman householders of Thūna heard that "Gotama the Sakyan contemplative, gone forth from the Sakyan clan, is wandering among the Mallans together with a large community of monks, and has arrived at Thūna." So they filled the well all the way to the brim with grass & chaff, [thinking], "Don't let these shaven-headed contemplatives draw drinking water."

Then the Blessed One, going down from the road, went to a certain tree, and on arrival sat down on a seat laid out. Seated, he said to Ven. Ānanda: "Please, Ānanda, fetch me some drinking water from that well."

When this was said, Ven. Ānanda replied, "Just now, lord, the brahman householders of Thūna filled that well all the way to the brim with grass & chaff, [thinking], 'Don't let these shaven-headed contemplatives draw drinking water.'"

A second time, the Blessed One said to Ven. Ānanda: "Please, Ānanda, fetch me some drinking water from that well."

A second time, Ven. Ānanda replied, "Just now, lord, the brahman householders of Thūna filled that well all the way to the brim with grass & chaff, [thinking], 'Don't let these shaven-headed contemplatives draw drinking water.'"

A third time, the Blessed One said to Ven. Ānanda: "Please, Ānanda, fetch me some drinking water from that well."

Responding, "As you say, lord," to the Blessed One, Ven. Ānanda–taking a bowl–went to the well. As he was approaching the well, it expelled all the grass & chaff from its mouth and stood filled to the brim–streaming, as it were–with pristine water, undisturbed & clear. The thought occurred to him, "How amazing! How astounding!–the great power & great might of the Tathāgata!–in that, while I was approaching the well, it expelled all the grass & chaff from its mouth and stood filled to the brim–streaming, as it were–with pristine water, undisturbed & clear."

Taking drinking water in his bowl, he went to the Blessed One and on arrival said, "How amazing, lord! How astounding!–the great power & great might of the Tathāgata!–in that, while I was approaching the well, it expelled all the grass & chaff from its mouth and stood filled to the brim–streaming, as it were–with pristine water, undisturbed & clear. Drink the water, O Blessed One! Drink the water, O One-Well-Gone!"

Then, on realizing the significance of that, the Blessed One on that occasion exclaimed:

What need for a well
if there were waters always?
Having cut craving
    by the root,
one would go about searching for what?

Ud 7:10 King Udena (Udena Sutta)

I have heard that on one occasion the Blessed One was staying near Kosambī at Ghosita's monastery. And on that occasion the inner quarters of King Udena's royal park had burned down, and 500 women, headed by Sāmāvatī, had died.

Then in the early morning, a large number of monks adjusted their under robes and–carrying their bowls & robes–went into Kosambī for alms. Having gone for alms in Kosambī, after the meal, returning from their alms round, they went to the Blessed One and, on arrival, having bowed down to him, sat to one side. As they were sitting there, they said to the Blessed One, "Lord, the inner quarters of King Udena's royal park have burned down, and 500 women, headed by Sāmāvatī, have died. What is the destination of those female lay followers? What is their future course?"

"Monks, among those female lay followers are stream-winners, once-returners, & non-returners. All of those female lay followers, monks, died not without [noble] fruit."

Then, on realizing the significance of that, the Blessed One on that occasion exclaimed:

> Bound round with delusion, the world > only appears to be competent.
> Bound with acquisitions, foolish, > surrounded by darkness,
> it seems eternal,
> but for one who sees,
> there is nothing.

Ud 8:1 Unbinding (1) (Nibbāna Sutta)

I have heard that on one occasion the Blessed One was staying near Sāvatthī at Jeta's Grove, Anāthapiṇḍika's monastery. And on that occasion the Blessed One was instructing, urging, rousing, & encouraging the monks with Dhamma-talk concerned with unbinding. The monks–receptive, attentive, focusing their entire awareness, lending ear–listened to the Dhamma.

Then, on realizing the significance of that, the Blessed One on that occasion exclaimed:

> There is that dimension, monks, where there is neither earth, nor water, nor fire, nor wind; neither dimension of the infinitude of space, nor dimension of the infinitude of consciousness, nor dimension of nothingness, nor dimension of neither perception nor non-perception; neither this world, nor the next world, nor sun, nor moon. And there, I say, there is neither coming, nor going, nor staying; neither passing away nor arising: unestablished,[1] unevolving, without support [mental object].[2] This, just this, is the end of stress.

Notes

1. On unestablished consciousness, see SN 22:87 and the discussion in The Paradox of Becoming, chapter 7.

2. See SN 22:53.

Ud 8:2 Unbinding (2) (Nibbāna Sutta)

I have heard that on one occasion the Blessed One was staying near Sāvatthī at Jeta's Grove, Anāthapiṇḍika's monastery. And on that occasion the Blessed One was instructing, urging, rousing, & encouraging the monks with Dhamma-talk concerned with unbinding. The monks–receptive, attentive, focusing their entire awareness, lending ear–listened to the Dhamma.

Then, on realizing the significance of that, the Blessed One on that occasion exclaimed:

> It's hard to see the unaffected, > for the truth is not easily seen.
> Craving is pierced
> in one who knows;
> for one who sees,
> there is nothing.[1]

Note

1. This last phrase can also be translated, "One who sees has nothing."

Ud 8:3 Unbinding (3) (Nibbāna Sutta)

I have heard that on one occasion the Blessed One was staying near Sāvatthī at Jeta's Grove, Anāthapiṇḍika's monastery. And on that occasion the Blessed One was instructing, urging, rousing, & encouraging the monks with Dhamma-talk concerned with unbinding. The monks–receptive, attentive, focusing their entire awareness, lending ear–listened to the Dhamma.

Then, on realizing the significance of that, the Blessed One on that occasion exclaimed:

> There is, monks, an unborn[1]–unbecome–unmade–unfabricated. If there were not that unborn–unbecome–unmade–unfabricated, there would not be the case that escape from the born–become–made–fabricated would be discerned. But precisely because there is an unborn–unbecome–unmade–unfabricated, escape from the born–become–made–fabricated is discerned.[2]

Notes

1. Some scholars have argued that the term "unborn" cannot be used to distinguish unbinding from transmigration, as there are discourses (such as SN 15:3) stating that transmigration itself has no beginning point, implying that it too is unborn. Thus they argue that in this passage the term ajātaṁ, although a past participle, should be translated as, "without birth." However, this argument is based on two questionable premises. First, it assumes that unbinding is here being contrasted with transmigration, even though the passage simply contrasts it with the fabricated. Secondly, even assuming that the phrase "the born–the become," etc., is a reference to transmigration, the scholars' argument is based on a misreading of SN 15:3. There, transmigration is said to have an "inconceivable" or "undiscoverable" beginning point. This is very different from saying that it is unborn. If transmigration were unborn, it would be unfabricated (see AN 3:47), which is obviously not the case. Thus, in translating this term to describe unbinding, I have maintained the straight grammatical reading, "unborn."

2. Iti 43 gives this exclamation as the synopsis of a Dhamma talk, followed by this verse:

> The born, become, produced,
> made, fabricated, impermanent,
> fabricated of aging & death,
> a nest of illnesses, perishing,
> come-into-being through nourishment
> and the guide [that is craving]–
> is unfit for delight.
>
> The escape from that
> is > calm, permanent,
> a sphere beyond conjecture,
> unborn, unproduced,
> the sorrowless, stainless state,
> the cessation of stressful qualities,
> stilling-of-fabrications bliss.

Ud 8:4 Unbinding (4) (Nibbāna Sutta)

I have heard that on one occasion the Blessed One was staying near Sāvatthī at Jeta's Grove, Anāthapiṇḍika's monastery. And on that occasion the Blessed One was instructing, urging, rousing, & encouraging the monks with Dhamma-talk concerned with unbinding. The monks–receptive, attentive, focusing their entire awareness, lending ear–listened to the Dhamma.

Then, on realizing the significance of that, the Blessed One on that occasion exclaimed:

> One who is dependent has wavering. One who is independent has no wavering. There being no wavering, there is calm. There being calm, there is no yearning. There being no yearning, there is no coming or going. There being no coming or going, there is no passing away or arising. There being no passing away or arising, there is neither a here nor a there nor a between-the-two. This, just this, is the end of stress.[1]

Note

1. In MN 144 and SN 35:87, Ven. Cunda quotes this passage as a teaching of the Buddha and tells Ven. Channa to keep it firmly in mind.

Ud 8:5 Cunda (Cunda Sutta)

I have heard that on one occasion, while the Blessed One was wandering among the Mallans with a large community of monks, he arrived at Pāvā. There he stayed near Pāvā in the mango grove of Cunda the silversmith.

Cunda the silversmith heard, "The Blessed One, they say, while wandering among the Mallans with a large community of monks and reaching Pāvā, is staying near Pāvā in my mango grove."

So Cunda went to the Blessed One and, on arrival, having bowed down to him, sat to one side. As he was sitting there, the Blessed One instructed, urged, roused, & encouraged him with Dhamma-talk. Then Cunda–instructed, urged, roused, & encouraged by the Blessed One's Dhamma-talk–said to him, "Lord, may the Blessed One acquiesce to my meal tomorrow, together with the community of monks."

The Blessed One acquiesced with silence.

Then Cunda, understanding the Blessed One's acquiescence, got up from his seat, bowed down to the Blessed One, and left, circling him to the right. Then, at the end of the night, after having exquisite staple & non-staple food–including a large amount of pig-delicacy[1]–prepared in his own home, he announced the time to the Blessed One: "It's time, lord. The meal is ready."

Then the Blessed One, early in the morning, adjusted his under robe and–carrying his bowl & robes–went together with the community of monks to Cunda's home. On arrival, he sat down on the seat laid out. Seated, he said to Cunda, "Cunda, serve me with the pig-delicacy you have had prepared, and the community of monks with the other staple & non-staple food you have had prepared."

Responding, "As you say, lord," to the Blessed One, Cunda served the Blessed One with the pig-delicacy he had had prepared, and the community of monks with the other staple & non-staple food he had had prepared. Then the Blessed One said to him, "Cunda, bury the remaining pig-delicacy in a pit. I don't see anyone in the world–together with its devas, Māras, & Brahmas, with its people with their contemplatives & brahmans, their royalty & commonfolk–in whom, when it was ingested, it would go to a healthy change, aside from the Tathāgata."

Responding, "As you say, lord," to the Blessed One, Cunda buried the remaining pig-delicacy in a pit, went to the Blessed One and, on arrival, after bowing down to him, sat to one side. As he was sitting there, the Blessed One–after instructing, urging, rousing, & encouraging him with Dhamma-talk–got up from his seat and left.

Then in the Blessed One, after he had eaten Cunda's meal, there arose a severe illness accompanied with (the passing of) blood, with intense pains & deadly. But the Blessed One endured it–mindful, alert, & not struck down by it.

Then he addressed Ven. Ānanda, "Ānanda, we will go to Kusinarā."

"As you say, lord," Ven. Ānanda responded to the Blessed One.

> I have heard that,
> on eating Cunda the silversmith's meal, > the enlightened one was touched by illness– > fierce, deadly.
> After he had eaten the pig-delicacy,
> a fierce sickness arose in the Teacher.
> After being purged of it,
> the Blessed One said,
> "To the city of Kusinarā
> I will go."[2]

Then the Blessed One, going down from the road, went to a certain tree and, on arrival, said to Ven. Ānanda, "Ānanda, please arrange my outer robe folded in four. I am tired. I will sit down."

Responding, "As you say, lord," to the Blessed One, Ven. Ānanda arranged the outer robe folded in four. The Blessed One sat down on the seat laid out.

Seated, he said to Ven. Ānanda, "Ānanda, please fetch me some water. I am thirsty. I will drink."

When this was said, Ven. Ānanda said to the Blessed One, "Lord, just now 500 carts have passed through. The meager river–cut by the wheels–flows turbid & disturbed. But the Kukuṭa river is not far away, with pristine water, pleasing water, cool water, pellucid water,[3] with restful banks, refreshing. There the Blessed One will drink potable water and cool his limbs."

A second time, the Blessed One said to Ven. Ānanda, "Ānanda, please fetch me some water. I am thirsty. I will drink."

A second time, Ven. Ānanda said to the Blessed One, "Lord, just now 500 carts have passed through. The meager water–cut by the wheels–flows turbid & disturbed. But the Kukuṭa River is not far away, with pristine water, pleasing water, cool water, pellucid water, with restful banks, refreshing. There the Blessed One will drink potable water and cool his limbs."

A third time, the Blessed One said to Ven. Ānanda, "Ānanda, please fetch me some water. I am thirsty. I will drink."

Responding, "As you say, lord," to the Blessed One, Ven. Ānanda–taking a bowl–went to the river. And the meager river that, cut by the wheels, had been flowing turbid & disturbed, on his approach flowed pristine, clear, & undisturbed. The thought occurred to him, "How amazing! How astounding!–the great power & great might of the Tathāgata!–in that this meager river that, cut by the wheels, was flowing turbid & disturbed, on my approach flowed pristine, clear, & undisturbed!" Fetching water with the bowl, he went to the Blessed One and on arrival said, "How amazing! How astounding!–the great power & great might of the Tathāgata!–in that this meager river that, cut by the wheels, was flowing turbid & disturbed, on my approach flowed pristine, clear, & undisturbed! Drink the water, O Blessed One! Drink the water, O One-Well-Gone!"

Then the Blessed One drank the water.[4]

Then the Blessed One, together with the community of monks, went to the Kukuṭa River and, after arriving at the Kukuṭa River, going down, bathing, drinking, & coming back out, went to a mango grove. On arrival, the Blessed One said to Ven. Cundaka, "Cundaka, please arrange my outer robe folded in four. I am tired. I will lie down."

Responding, "As you say, lord," to the Blessed One, Ven. Cundaka arranged the outer robe folded in four. The Blessed One, lying on his right side, took up the lion's posture, placing one foot on top of the other– mindful, alert, and attending to the perception of getting up. Ven. Cundaka sat in front of him.

> The awakened one,
> –having gone to the little Kukuṭa river > with its pristine, pleasing water, clear– > the Teacher, seeming very tired, > the Tathāgata, unequalled in the world > went down, bathed, drank, & came out.
> Honored, surrounded,
> in the midst of the group of monks,
> the Blessed One, Teacher, > proceeding here in the Dhamma,
> the great seer,
> went to the mango grove.
> He addressed the monk named Cundaka,
> "Spread it out, folded in four > for me to lie down."
> Ordered by the One of developed mind,
> Cundaka quickly set it out, folded in four.
> The Teacher lay down, seeming very tired, > and Cundaka sat down there before him.

Then the Blessed One addressed Ven. Ānanda, "Ānanda, if anyone tries to incite remorse in Cunda the silversmith, saying, 'It's no gain for you, friend Cunda, it's ill-done by you, that the Tathāgata, having eaten your last alms, was totally unbound,' then Cunda's remorse should be allayed (in this way): 'It's a gain for you, friend Cunda, it's well-done by you, that the Tathāgata, having eaten your last alms, was totally unbound. Face to face with the Blessed One have I heard it, face to face have I learned it, "These two alms are equal to each other in fruit, equal to each other in result, of much greater fruit & reward than any other alms. Which two?

The alms that, after having eaten it, the Tathāgata awakens to the unexcelled right self-awakening. And the alms that, after having eaten it, the Tathāgata is unbound by means of the unbinding property with no fuel remaining.[5] These are the two alms that are equal to each other in fruit, equal to each other in result, of much greater fruit & reward than any other alms. Venerable[6] Cunda the silversmith has accumulated kamma that leads to long life. Venerable Cunda the silversmith has accumulated kamma that leads to beauty. Venerable Cunda the silversmith has accumulated kamma that leads to happiness. Venerable Cunda the silversmith has accumulated kamma that leads to heaven. Venerable Cunda the silversmith has accumulated kamma that leads to rank. Venerable Cunda the silversmith has accumulated kamma that leads to sovereignty.'" In this way, Ānanda, Cunda the silversmith's remorse should be allayed."

Then, on realizing the significance of that, the Blessed One on that occasion exclaimed:

For a person giving,
merit increases.
For one self-restraining,
no animosity is amassed.
One who is skillful leaves evil behind
and
–from the ending of passion,
aversion,
delusion–
is totally unbound.

Notes

1. The Commentary notes a wide range of opinions on what "pig-delicacy" means. The opinion given in the Mahā Aṭṭhakathā–the primary source for the Commentary we now have–is that pig-delicacy is tender pork. Other opinions include soft bamboo shoots or mushrooms that pigs like to nibble on, or a special elixir. Given that India has long had a history of giving fanciful names to its foods and elixirs, it's hard to say for sure what the Buddha ate for his last meal.

2. This style of narrative–in which prose passages alternate with verses retelling parts of what was narrated in the prose–is called a campū. This sutta is one of the few instances of this type of narrative in the Pali Canon. Another is the Kuṇāla Jātaka (J 5:416-456). There are also some Vedic examples of this form in the Brāhmaṇas, texts that apparently dated from around the same time as the Pali Canon. When the incidents portrayed in this sutta were included in DN 16, these alternating narrative verses were included. Aside from the Buddha's conversation with Pukkusa the Mallan (see note 4), these are the only incidents that DN 16 narrates in this style. This suggests that perhaps the version of the narrative given here was composed first as a separate piece and then later was incorporated into DN 16.

3. Ven. Ānanda's description of the water is alliterative in the Pali: sātodakā sītodakā setodakā.

4. At this point in the narrative, DN 16 inserts the account of the Buddha's encounter with Pukkusa the Mallan. There's no way of knowing which version of the events is earlier, as the focus of this sutta is not on telling everything that happened to the Buddha on his final day, but on recounting all the events related to Cunda's meal.

5. Unbinding as experienced by an arahant at death. The image is of a fire so thoroughly out that the embers are totally cold. This is distinguished from the unbinding property with fuel remaining–unbinding as experienced in this lifetime–which is like a fire that has gone out but whose embers are still glowing. See Iti 44, Thag 15:2, and the discussion in The Mind Like Fire Unbound, chapter 1.

6. Āyasmant: This is a term of respect usually reserved for senior monks. The Buddha's using it here was probably meant to emphasize the point that Cunda's gift of the Buddha's last meal should be treated as a very honorable thing.

Ud 8:6 Pāṭali Village (Pāṭaligāma Sutta)

I have heard that on one occasion, while the Blessed One was wandering among the Magadhans with a large community of monks, he arrived at Pāṭali Village. The lay followers of Pāṭali Village heard, "The Blessed One, they say, while wandering among the Magadhans with a large community of monks, has reached Pāṭali Village." So they went to the Blessed One and, on arrival, having bowed down to him, sat to one side. As they were sitting there, they said to him, "Lord, may the Blessed One acquiesce to (the use of) the rest-house hall."

The Blessed One acquiesced with silence. Sensing his acquiescence, the lay followers of Pāṭali Village got up from their seats, bowed down to him, circled him to the right, and then went to the rest-house hall. On arrival, they spread it all over with felt rugs, arranged seats, set out a water vessel, and raised an oil lamp. Then they went to the Blessed One and, on arrival, having bowed down, stood to one side. As they were standing there they said to him, "Lord, the rest-house hall has been covered all over with felt rugs, seats have been arranged, a water vessel has been set out, and an oil lamp raised. May the Blessed One do what you think it is now time to do."

So the Blessed One, adjusting his under robe and–carrying his bowl & robes[1]–went together with a community of monks to the rest-house hall. On arrival he washed his feet, entered the hall, and sat with his back to the central post, facing east. The community of monks washed their feet, entered the hall, and sat with their backs to the western wall, facing east, ranged around the Blessed One.

The lay followers of Pāṭali Village washed their feet, entered the hall, and sat with their backs to the eastern wall, facing west, ranged around the Blessed One.

Then the Blessed One addressed the lay followers of Pāṭali Village, "Householders, there are these five drawbacks coming from an unvirtuous person's failure in virtue. Which five?

"There is the case where an unvirtuous person, by reason of heedlessness, undergoes the loss/confiscation of great wealth. This is the first drawback coming from an unvirtuous person's failure in virtue.

"Furthermore, the bad reputation of the unvirtuous person, failing in virtue, gets spread about. This is the second drawback coming from an unvirtuous person's failure in virtue.

"Furthermore, whatever assembly the unvirtuous person, failing in virtue, approaches–whether of noble warriors, brahmans, householders, or contemplatives–he/she does so without confidence & abashed. This is the third drawback coming from an unvirtuous person's failure in virtue.

"Furthermore, the unvirtuous person, failing in virtue, dies confused. This is the fourth drawback coming from an unvirtuous person's failure in virtue.

"Furthermore, the unvirtuous person, failing in virtue–on the break-up of the body, after death–reappears in a plane of deprivation, a bad destination, a lower realm, a hell. This is the fifth drawback coming from an unvirtuous person's failure in virtue.

"These, householders, are the five drawbacks coming from an unvirtuous person's failure in virtue.

"Householders, there are these five rewards coming from a virtuous person's consummation in virtue. Which five?

"There is the case where a virtuous person, by reason of heedfulness, acquires a great mass of wealth. This is the first reward coming from a virtuous person's consummation in virtue.

"Furthermore, the fine reputation of the virtuous person, consummate in virtue, gets spread about. This is the second reward coming from a virtuous person's consummation in virtue.

"Furthermore, whatever assembly the virtuous person, consummate in virtue, approaches–whether of noble warriors, brahmans, householders, or contemplatives–he/she does so with confidence & unabashed. This is the third reward coming from a virtuous person's consummation in virtue.

"Furthermore, the virtuous person, consummate in virtue, dies unconfused. This is the fourth reward coming from a virtuous person's consummation in virtue.

"Furthermore, the virtuous person, consummate in virtue–on the break-up of the body, after death–reappears in a good destination, a heavenly world. This is the fifth reward coming from a virtuous person's consummation in virtue.

"These, householders, are the five rewards coming from a virtuous person's consummation in virtue."

Then the Blessed One–having instructed, urged, roused, & encouraged the lay followers of Pāṭali Village for a large part of the night with Dhamma-talk–dismissed them, saying, "The night is far gone, householders. Do what you think it is now time to do."

So the lay followers of Pāṭali Village, delighting in & approving of the Blessed One's words, got up from their seats, bowed down to him, and left, circling him to the right. Then the Blessed One, not long after they had left, entered an empty building.

Now, on that occasion, Sunīdha & Vassakāra, the chief ministers of Magadha, were building a city at Pāṭali Village to preempt the Vajjians. And on that occasion many devas by the thousands were occupying sites in Pāṭali Village. In the area where devas of great influence occupied sites, there the minds of the king's royal ministers of great influence were inclined to build their homes. In the area where devas of middling influence occupied sites, there the minds of the king's royal ministers of middling influence were inclined to build their homes. In the area where devas of low influence occupied sites, there the minds of the king's royal ministers of low influence were inclined to build their homes.

The Blessed One, with the divine eye–purified and surpassing the human–saw many devas by the thousands occupying sites in Pāṭali Village. In the area where devas of great influence occupied sites, there the minds of the king's royal ministers of great influence were inclined to build their homes. In the area where devas of middling influence occupied sites, there the minds of the king's royal ministers of middling influence were inclined to build their homes. In the area where devas of low influence occupied sites, there the minds of the king's royal ministers of low influence were inclined to build their homes.

Then, getting up in the last watch of the night, the Blessed One addressed Ven. Ānanda, "Ānanda, who is building a city at Pāṭali Village?"

"Sunīdha & Vassakāra, the chief ministers of Magadha, lord, are building a city at Pāṭali Village to preempt the Vajjians."

"Ānanda, it's as if they had consulted the Devas of the Thirty-three: That's how Sunīdha & Vassakāra, the chief ministers of Magadha, are building a city at Pāṭali Village to preempt the Vajjians.

"Just now, Ānanda–with the divine eye–purified and surpassing the human–I saw many devas by the thousands occupying sites in Pāṭali Village. In the area where devas of great influence occupy sites, there the minds of the king's royal ministers of great influence are inclined to build their homes. In the area where devas of middling influence occupy sites, there the minds of the king's royal ministers of middling influence are inclined to build their homes. In the area where devas of low influence occupy sites, there the minds of the king's royal ministers of low influence are inclined to build their homes.

"Ānanda, as far as the sphere of the Ariyans extends, as far as merchants' roads extend, this will be the supreme city: Pāṭaliputta,[2] where the seedpods of the Pāṭali plant break open. There will be three dangers for Pāṭaliputta: from fire, from water, and from the breaking of alliances."

Then Sunīdha & Vassakāra, the chief ministers of Magadha, went to the Blessed One and, on arrival, exchanged courteous greetings with him. After an exchange of friendly greetings & courtesies, they stood to one side. As they were standing there, they said to him, "May Master Gotama acquiesce to our meal today, together with the community of monks." The Blessed One acquiesced with silence.

Then Sunīdha & Vassakāra, the chief ministers of Magadha, understanding the Blessed One's acquiescence, went to their rest-house. On arrival, after having exquisite staple & non-staple food prepared in their rest-house, they announced the time to the Blessed One: "It's time, Master Gotama. The meal is ready."

Then the Blessed One, early in the morning, adjusted his under robe and–carrying his bowl & robes–went together with the community of monks to the rest-house of Sunīdha & Vassakāra, the chief ministers of Magadha. On arrival, he sat down on the seat laid out. Sunīdha & Vassakāra, with their own hands, served & satisfied the community of monks, with the Buddha at its head, with exquisite staple & non-staple food. Then, when the Blessed One had finished his meal and rinsed his bowl & hands, Sunīdha & Vassakāra, taking a low seat, sat to one side. As they were sitting there, the Blessed One gave his approval with these verses:

In whatever place
a wise person makes his dwelling, –there providing food
for the virtuous,
the restrained,
leaders of the holy life– he should dedicate that offering to the devas there.

They, receiving honor, will honor him;
being respected, will show him respect.
As a result, they will feel sympathy for him, like that of a mother for her child, her son.
A person with whom the devas sympathize always meets with auspicious things.

Then the Blessed One, having given his approval to Sunīdha & Vassakāra with these verses, got up from his seat and left. And on that occasion, Sunīdha & Vassakāra followed right after the Blessed One, (thinking,) "By whichever gate Gotama the contemplative departs today, that will be called the Gotama Gate. And by whichever ford he crosses over the Ganges River, that will be called the Gotama Ford."

So the gate by which the Blessed One departed was called the Gotama Gate. Then he went to the Ganges River. Now on that occasion the Ganges River was full up to the banks, so that a crow could drink from it. Some people were searching for boats, some were searching for floats, some were binding rafts in hopes of going from this shore to the other. So the Blessed One–just as a strong man might extend his flexed arm or flex his extended arm–disappeared from the near bank of the Ganges River and reappeared on the far bank together with the community of monks.

He saw that some people were searching for boats, some were searching for floats, some were binding rafts in hopes of going from this shore to the other.

Then, on realizing the significance of that, the Blessed One on that occasion exclaimed:

> Those
> who cross the foaming flood, > having made a bridge, avoiding the swamps > –while people are binding rafts– > have already crossed
> : the wise.

Notes

1. The translation here follows the Burmese and Sri Lankan editions of the text. The PTS and Thai editions state that the Buddha went to the rest-house hall in the morning–which, given the events that follow, doesn't seem right, for he would have spent the entire day teaching the lay followers of Pāṭali Village. The Burmese and Sri Lankan editions of the account of these events given in DN 16 state explicitly that the Buddha went to the rest-house hall in the late afternoon, which seems more reasonable. The PTS edition of that passage doesn't state the time of day, while the Thai edition states that he went in the morning.

2. Pāṭaliputta later became the capital of King Asoka's empire. The "breaking open of the seed-pods (pūṭa-bhedana)" is a wordplay on the last part of the city's name.

Archaeological evidence from what may have been part of Asoka's palace in Pāṭaliputta shows burnt wooden posts buried in mud–perhaps a sign that the palace burned and then was buried in a flood.

Ud 8:7 A Fork in the Path (Dvidhapatha Sutta)

I have heard that on one occasion the Blessed One was journeying along a road in the Kosalan country with Ven. Nāgasamāla as his junior companion. Ven. Nāgasamāla, while going along the road, saw a fork in the path. On seeing it, he said to the Blessed One, "That, lord Blessed One,[1] is the route. We go that way." When this was said, the Blessed One said, "This, Nāgasamāla, is the route. We go this way."

A second time… A third time, Ven. Nāgasamāla said to the Blessed One, "That, lord Blessed One, is the route. We go that way." And for a third time, the Blessed One said, "This, Nāgasamāla, is the route. We go this way."

Then Ven. Nāgasamāla, placing the Blessed One's bowl & robes right there on the ground, left, saying, "This, lord Blessed One, is the bowl & robes."

Then as Ven. Nāgasamāla was going along that route, thieves–jumping out in the middle of the road–pummeled him with their fists & feet, broke his bowl, and ripped his outer robe to shreds.

So Ven. Nāgasamāla–with his bowl broken, his outer robe ripped to shreds–went to the Blessed One and, on arrival, bowed down to him and sat to one side. As he was sitting there he said to the Blessed One, "Just now, lord, as I was going along that route, thieves jumped out in the middle of the road, pummeled me with their fists & feet, broke my bowl, and ripped my outer robe to shreds."

Then, on realizing the significance of that, the Blessed One on that occasion exclaimed:

> When traveling together, > mixed together
> with a person who doesn't know,
> an attainer-of-wisdom,

on realizing that the person is evil, abandons him
as a milk-feeding[2] heron, a bog.

Notes

1. Throughout the first part of this story, Ven. Nāgasamāla refers to the Buddha with this exaggerated form of address. Perhaps the compilers meant this as a linguistic hint of how inappropriate an attendant he was for the Buddha. (Suppavāsā uses it in Ud 2:8, but there it is appropriate as she is overcome with joy.) At the point in the present narrative where Ven. Nāgasamāla puts the Buddha's bowl and robes on the ground, the Sri Lankan and Burmese editions correct his statement to the more appropriate: "This, lord, is the Blessed One's bowl & robes." However, to be in keeping with his normal way of addressing the Buddha, and to stress the rudeness of the gesture, I felt it better to keep the sentence as it is in the Thai edition. Only after Ven. Nāgasamāla is chastened by his experience with the thieves does he revert to the using the simpler and more standard address: "lord."

2. Milk-feeding = khīrapaka. This is a poetic way of saying "young and unweaned"–the "milk" here being the regurgitated food with which the mother heron feeds her young. Also–in the conventions of Indian literature–the reference to milk suggests that the heron is white. The Commentary has a fanciful way of explaining this term, saying that it refers to a special type of heron so sensitive that, when fed milk mixed with water, it drinks just the milk.

Ud 8:8 Visākhā (Visākhā Sutta)

I have heard that on one occasion the Blessed One was staying near Sāvatthī at the Eastern Monastery, the palace of Migāra's mother. And on that occasion a dear and beloved grandson of Visākhā, Migāra's mother, had died. So Visākhā, Migāra's mother–her clothes wet, her hair wet–went to the Blessed One in the middle of the day and, on arrival, having bowed down to him, sat to one side. As she was sitting there the Blessed One said to her: "Why have you come here, Visākhā–your clothes wet, your hair wet–in the middle of the day?"

When this was said, she said to the Blessed One, "My dear and beloved grandson has died. This is why I have come here–my clothes wet, my hair wet–in the middle of the day."

"Visākhā, would you like to have as many children & grandchildren as there are people in Sāvatthī?"

"Yes, lord, I would like to have as many children & grandchildren as there are people in Sāvatthī."

"But how many people in Sāvatthī die in the course of a day?"

"Sometimes ten people die in Sāvatthī in the course of a day, sometimes nine… eight… seven… six… five… four… three… two… Sometimes one person dies in Sāvatthī in the course of a day. Sāvatthī is never free from people dying."

"So what do you think, Visākhā? Would you ever be free of wet clothes & wet hair?"

"No, lord. Enough of my having so many children & grandchildren."

"Visākhā, those who have a hundred dear ones have a hundred sufferings. Those who have ninety dear ones have ninety sufferings. Those who have eighty… seventy… sixty… fifty… forty… thirty… twenty… ten… nine… eight… seven… six… five… four… three… two… Those who have one dear one have one suffering. Those who have no dear ones have no sufferings. They are free from sorrow, free from stain, free from lamentation, I tell you."

Then, on realizing the significance of that, the Blessed One on that occasion exclaimed:

> The sorrows, lamentations,
> the many kinds of suffering in the world,
> exist dependent on something dear.
> They don't exist
> when there's nothing dear.
> And thus blissful & sorrowless > are those for whom nothing > in the world is anywhere dear.
> So one who aspires > to the stainless & sorrowless > shouldn't make anything > dear
> in the world
> anywhere.

Ud 8:9 Dabba (1) (Dabba Sutta)

I have heard that on one occasion the Blessed One was staying near Sāvatthī at Jeta's Grove, Anāthapiṇḍika's monastery. Then Ven. Dabba Mallaputta went to the Blessed One and, on arrival, having bowed down to him, sat to one side. As he was sitting there he said to the Blessed One, "Now is the time for my total unbinding, O One-Well-Gone!"

"Then do, Dabba, what you think it is now time to do."

Then Ven. Dabba Mallaputta, rising from his seat, bowed down to the Blessed One and, circling him on the right, rose up into the air and sat cross-legged in the sky, in space. Entering & emerging from the fire property, he was totally unbound. Now, when Dabba Mallaputta rose up into the air and, sitting cross-legged in the sky, in space, entered & emerged from the fire property and was totally unbound, his body burned and was consumed so that neither ashes nor soot could be discerned. Just as when ghee or oil is burned and consumed, neither ashes nor soot can be discerned, in the same way, when Dabba Mallaputta rose up into the air and, sitting cross-legged in the sky, in space, entered & emerged from the fire property and was totally unbound, his body burned and was consumed so that neither ashes nor soot could be discerned.

Then, on realizing the significance of that, the Blessed One on that occasion exclaimed:

> The body broke up,
> perception ceased,
> feelings went cold[1]
> –all–[2]
> fabrications were stilled, > consciousness
> has come to an end.

Notes

1. Following the reading vedanā sītibhaviṁsu from the Burmese and Sri Lankan editions. In support of this reading, see MN 140 and Iti 44. The Thai edition reads, vedanā-pīti-dahaṁsu: feeling & rapture were burned away.

2. The word "all" here functions as a lamp, modifying both "feelings" and "fabrications." See Ud 1:3, note 1.

Ud 8:10 Dabba (2) (Dabba Sutta)

I have heard that on one occasion the Blessed One was staying near Sāvatthī at Jeta's Grove, Anāthapiṇḍika's monastery. There he addressed the monks, "Monks!"

"Yes, lord," the monks responded to him.

The Blessed One said, "When Dabba Mallaputta rose up into the air and, sitting cross-legged in the sky, in space, entered & emerged from the fire property and was totally unbound, his body burned and was consumed so that neither ashes nor soot could be discerned. Just as when ghee or oil is burned and consumed, neither ashes nor soot can be discerned, in the same way, when Dabba Mallaputta rose up into the air and, sitting cross-legged in the sky, in space, entered & emerged from the fire property and was totally unbound, his body burned and was consumed so that neither ashes nor soot could be discerned."

Then, on realizing the significance of that, the Blessed One on that occasion exclaimed:

> Just as the destination of a glowing fire > struck with a [blacksmith's] iron hammer, > gradually growing calm, > isn't known:[1]
> Even so, there's no destination to describe > for those rightly released > –having crossed over the flood > of sensuality's bond– > for those who've attained > unwavering bliss.

Appendices

Appendix One: History

On the history of the Udāna

Passages in the Canon mention udānas in a list of nine genres in which the Buddha's teachings and events in his life were memorized during his lifetime. There has been some speculation as to whether the Udāna we currently have is in any way related to the udānas mentioned in the list. The general consensus is that most of the exclamations at the end of our current udānas might possibly date from the Buddha's time, but that the stories are obviously a much later invention. There is, however, no proof for either position.

The question of how to prove through textual analysis whether the exclamations actually came from the Buddha is essentially uninteresting: There is no historical evidence to prove or disprove that anything in the Canon came from the Buddha; the only way to test the value of what the Canon contains is to put its teachings to the test.

It is interesting, however, to examine the arguments for assigning a late date to the stories in the Udānas, for when we examine these arguments we find that they teach us more about the assumptions of the people who present them than about the Udāna itself.

The arguments fall into two main classes: those based on the form of the text, and those on the content.

The first formal argument for the lateness of the stories is based on the fact that a fraction of the exclamations occur elsewhere in the major poetry anthologies of the Canon without any connection to the stories in the Udāna. I have noted some of these parallels in the notes. Here they are as a list:

1:9 (last half) = Dhp 393 (last half)
2:3 = Dhp 131–132
3:4 = Thag 14:1 (PTS v. 651); Thag 17:2 (PTS v. 1000)
3:6 (first part) = Sn 3:4 (PTS v. 469) (first part)
4:3 = Dhp 42
4:4 = near equivalent, Thag 2:36 (PTS vv. 191—192)
4:6 = Dhp 185
4:7 = Thag 1:68
4:9 = Sn 3:12 (PTS v. 746)
5:5 = Thag 6:13 (PTS v. 447)
6:3 (last half) = Thag 2:30 (PTS v. 180 — last half) 6:7 (first half) = Sn 1:1 (PTS v. 7 — last half)
7:4 (first part) = Thag 4:8 (PTS v. 297)

In addition to these parallels in the Pali Canon, variants of all the exclamations also appear, again without stories, in the Udānavarga, a compilation of verses in Buddhist Hybrid Sanskrit made by a Sarvāstivādin monk, Dharmatrāta, somewhere between 75 B.C.E and 200 C.E. From these facts the argument maintains that because these verses occur without a story in some places, but with a story in the Udāna, the stories must be later additions.

The problem with this argument is that it ignores the possibility that the compilers of the other texts might have had a different purpose than the compilers of the Udāna. They could have simply been interested in creating anthologies of verses shorn of any narrative frameworks. What's ironic is that this latter point is sometimes used to "prove" the lateness of the Dhammapada as a collection: Some of the Dhammapada verses occur associated with stories in other parts of the Pali Canon, and scholars have argued that the compilers of the Dhammapada simply lifted the verses from those passages and dropped the stories.

Because this argument can be used either way–to prove that collections of verses with stories are later than collections of verses without stories, and that collections of verses without stories are later than collections of verses with stories–it doesn't really prove either position.

A second set of arguments for the lateness of the Udāna is based on the fact that thirteen of the udānas–story and verse–also occur elsewhere in the Canon:

1:1 – Mv.I.1.1—3 (different details in the story)
1:2 – Mv.I.1.4—5 (different details in the story)
1:3 – Mv.I.1.6.7
1:4 – Mv.I.2
2:1 – Mv.I.3
2:10 – Cv.VII.1.5—6
4:5 – Mv.X.3—4 (different details in the story)
5:5 – Cv.IX.1, AN 8:20 (no verse)
5:6 – Mv.V.13.1—10 (different details in the story; the verse is also different in the PTS but not in the Thai, Sri Lankan, or Burmese editions)
5:8 – Cv.VII.3.17
6:1 – DN 16, SN 51:10, AN 8:77
8:5 – DN 16 (includes an intervening incident not narrated in 8:5)
8:6 – Mv.VI.28, DN 16

What's notable about these parallels is that seven of the thirteen occur in the two longest biographical accounts in the Canon: the account of the events leading from the Buddha's awakening to his gaining his two foremost disciples in Mv.I; and the account of his last year in DN 16. From this fact, scholars have argued that these udānas were simply lifted from these longer accounts. Because DN 16 is regarded as a late document, this would mean that the compilation of the Udāna was even later. Sometimes this argument is bolstered with another one: that originally the monks compiled a continuous narrative of the events in the Buddha's life, but for some reason the narrative was chopped up into the bits and pieces we now find in the early canons, whereas the narrative as a whole was forgotten or lost.

This latter argument, of course, is purely conjectural, based largely on the assumption that the early monks would have had a modern Western desire for a complete biography of their teacher. And it begs the question, why would the monks have thrown away a perfectly good continuous narrative if they had had one?

As for the preceding argument, it is belied by two facts. The first is that the longer narratives containing parallels to the udānas lack a sense of flow. If anything, they read as if they were stitched together from preexisting materials, the udānas being among them. Second, one of the udānas with a parallel in DN 16–8:5–is composed in a style called campū, in which the narrative is told in both prose and verse. This style is rarely used in the Canon. If it was originally part of DN 16 before being chopped off into an udāna, we would reasonably expect that the rest of DN 16 would also be composed in this style. But it isn't. The events in 8:5, together with an intervening incident not included in 8:5, are the only parts of DN 16 narrated in the campū style. This suggests–even though it doesn't prove–that 8:5 was composed separately before it was included in DN 16.

Thus this second set of formal arguments proves nothing about the relative earliness or lateness of the Udāna.

A third set of formal arguments is based on the fact that neither the Chinese nor the Tibetan canons contain any text corresponding to the Udāna. Both canons contain versions of Dharmatrāta's Udānavarga mentioned above, with stories relegated to commentaries on the verses. Because these canons treat the stories as later additions, it has been argued that the Udāna in the Pali Canon was composed after the schools represented in the Chinese and Tibetan canons split off from the Theravāda.

This argument, however, is based on the assumption that these other two canons contain complete accounts of what was available in India at the time they were compiled. However, the Tibetan canon contains very few "Hīnayāna" texts, as its compilers were much more interested in the later vehicles, so the lack of the Udāna in this compilation proves nothing.

Similarly, the collection of "Hīnayāna" texts in the Chinese canon, while more complete than that in the Tibetan, is still fairly haphazard. There is no complete canon from any of the early schools; the different nikāyas (or āgamas as they are called in the Chinese collection) apparently come from a variety of early schools. And the Chinese canon itself was a late attempt, during the early Sung dynasty, to gather whatever texts, through happenstance, had made their way to China and into Chinese translation by the time of the T'ang dynasty and had survived into the Sung.

We do know that some of the texts brought to China during the T'ang are not in the collection. In 645, the pilgrim-monk Hsüan-tsang returned to the Chinese capital with a hoard of more than 675 Buddhist texts, many of them new to China, that he had acquired during a long overland trip to India. The emperor at the time was impressed with Hsüan-tsang's achievement and provided him with the resources needed to set up an expert board of translators. However, most of the texts were never translated. After Hsüan-tsang's death and the death of the emperor, the emperor's successor, who had no interest in Buddhism, disbanded the board of translators and sequestered the texts in the imperial library, where they were eventually lost or destroyed. We know that at least one "Hīnayāna" text was in Hsüan-tsang's hoard, as there is a partial Itivuttaka among his translations. There may have been other similar texts as well.

Thus the lack of an Udāna in the Chinese canon does not prove that the Udāna as we have it was a late text. It simply may not have attracted the attention of the Chinese or their Central Asia teachers; or it may have been in Hsüan-tsang's collection but later lost.

So none of these three sets of arguments from the form of the text prove anything about the relative earliness or lateness of the Udāna we now have.

The two main arguments from content are similarly inconclusive.

The first of these arguments is that the stories of the Udāna contain too many supernatural elements to be genuine. This, of course, assumes that people close to the Buddha witnessed no supernatural events surrounding his teaching–an assumption that derives less from any knowledge about what actually happened in the Buddha's life, and more from a modern discomfort with the supernatural. Stories about people levitating, using clairvoyant powers, etc.–unless presented as fiction–offend modern materialistic sensibilities. Modern scholars like to assume that the Buddha and his early disciples shared these sensibilities, and that religious and supernatural elements could have been added to the texts only after those who had directly known the Buddha had passed away. Yet the Canon consistently shows the Buddha to have been an opponent of materialism (DN 2; AN 3:138; MN 60). Thus there is no reason to assume that he or his direct disciples would have been disinclined to believe or report what, from a materialistic perspective, would count as supernatural powers or events.

As for the actual possibility of such powers, modern science has yet to disprove that they exist. Recent advances in sub-atomic physics and the study of the dynamics of complex non-linear systems show that the physical world is much stranger and less deterministic than the materialistic linear sciences of the eighteenth and nineteenth centuries would have allowed for, and yet a lot of modern thinking outside of the sciences has not caught up with this fact.

At the same time, there is no way that a fair assessment of the powers attainable through meditation could be made by anyone who has yet to master meditation. It would be like a future race of philosophers trying to assess modern scientific discoveries without having mastered the scientific method themselves. Just because there is no room in one's philosophy for a particular skill doesn't mean that such skills can't be acquired. Why make the limitations of one's imagination the measure of the actual world?

The second argument for the lateness of the Udāna based on its content focuses not on the stories, but on some of the exclamations themselves: those in 8:1, 8:3, and 8:4 describing unbinding as a dimension that can be experienced. The argument is this: Because the consciousness-aggregate ends with the attaining of unbinding, any description of unbinding as a dimension that can be experienced is suspect. Therefore these exclamations must be later additions to the Canon.

This argument is based on the assumption that there can be no consciousness outside of the consciousness-aggregate, inasmuch as the definition of that aggregate concludes with the phrase that it includes, "all consciousness, past, present, and future" (SN 22:59). However, the Buddha elsewhere limits the term "all" to what can be known in conjunction with the six senses (SN 35:23). And there are other passages, aside from these passages in the Udāna, indicating that there can be something known outside of the six senses (DN 11, MN 49, SN 35:117). DN 11 and

MN 49, in fact, refer to this awareness as "consciousness without feature" or "consciousness without surface" (viññāṇaṁ anidassanaṁ). Because this consciousness lies outside of the dimension of time–it's akālika–it is neither momentary nor eternal, and cannot be labeled as past, present, or future, for all such concepts have meaning only within the dimension of time. Thus it lies outside the definition of the consciousness-aggregate, and would not be ended when that aggregate ceases, either in the experience of awakening or after the death of the arahant.

(Another argument that there can be no consciousness outside of the consciousness-aggregate is based on a mistranslation of MN 38. Because the argument is technical, I will omit it here. If you are interested, you can find it in the notes to my translation of that discourse and in Skill in Questions, chapter 5, §72, note 2.)

All of this means that the exclamations in 8:1, 8:3, and 8:4 do not conflict with the rest of the Canon. In fact, Iti 43 also contains the exclamation in 8:3, and MN 144 and SN 35:87 cite the exclamation in 8:4 as a teaching of the Buddha. So there is no reason to dismiss these passages as late.

All of which means that the arguments for the lateness of the Udāna–whether based on form or on content–have yet to provide any compelling reason to regard the Udāna as a late addition to the Canon.

Appendix Two: Non-Udāna Exclamations

Exclamations by the Buddha recorded elsewhere in the Canon but not included in the Udāna:

From MN 75: To Māgandiya (Māgandiya Sutta)

"Now what do you think, Māgandiya? Have you ever seen or heard of a king or king's minister–enjoying himself, provided & endowed with the five strands of sensual pleasure, without abandoning sensual craving, without removing sensual fever–who has dwelt or will dwell or is dwelling free from thirst, his mind inwardly at peace?"

"No, Master Gotama."

"Very good, Māgandiya. Neither have I ever seen or heard of a king or king's minister–enjoying himself, provided & endowed with the five strands of sensual pleasure, without abandoning sensual craving, without removing sensual fever–who has dwelt or will dwell or is dwelling free from thirst, his mind inwardly at peace. But whatever contemplatives or brahmans who have dwelt or will dwell or are dwelling free from thirst, their minds inwardly at peace, all have done so having realized–as it has come to be–the origination & disappearance, the allure, the danger, & the escape from sensual pleasures, having abandoned sensual craving and removed sensual fever."

Then at that moment the Blessed One exclaimed,

"Freedom from disease:
the foremost good fortune.
Unbinding:
the foremost ease.
The eightfold:
the foremost of paths
going to the Deathless,

Secure."

When this was said, Māgandiya the wanderer said to the Blessed One, "It's amazing, Master Gotama. It's astounding, how this, too, is well-stated by Master Gotama: 'Freedom from disease: the foremost good fortune. Unbinding: the foremost ease.' We have also heard this said by earlier wanderers in the lineage of our teachers: 'Freedom from disease: the foremost good fortune. Unbinding: the foremost ease.' This agrees with that."

"But as for what you have heard said by earlier wanderers in the lineage of your teachers, Māgandiya–'Freedom from disease: the foremost good fortune. Unbinding: the foremost ease'–which freedom from disease is that, which unbinding?"

When this was said, Māgandiya the wanderer rubbed his own limbs with his hand. "This is that freedom from disease, Master Gotama," he said. "This is that unbinding. For I am now free from disease, happy, and nothing afflicts me."

"Māgandiya, it's just as if there were a man blind from birth who couldn't see black objects… white… blue… yellow… red… or pink objects; who couldn't see even or uneven places, the stars, the sun, or the moon. He would hear a man with good eyesight saying, 'How wonderful, good sirs, is a white cloth–beautiful, spotless, & clean.' He would go in search of something white. Then another man would fool him with a grimy, oil-stained rag: 'Here, my good man, is a white cloth–beautiful, spotless, & clean.' The blind man would take it and put it on. Having put it on, gratified, he would exclaim words of gratification, 'How wonderful, good sirs, is a white cloth–beautiful, spotless, & clean.' Now what do you think, Māgandiya? When that man blind from birth took the grimy, oil-stained rag and put it on; and, having put it on, gratified, exclaimed words of gratification, 'How wonderful, good sirs, is a white cloth–beautiful, spotless, & clean': Did he do so knowing & seeing, or out of faith in the man with good eyesight?"

"Of course he did it not knowing & not seeing, Master Gotama, but out of faith in the man with good eyesight."

"In the same way, Māgandiya, the wanderers of other sects are blind & eyeless. Without knowing freedom from disease, without seeing unbinding, they still speak this verse:

"Freedom from disease:
the foremost good fortune.
Unbinding:
the foremost ease.'

This verse was stated by earlier worthy ones, fully self-awakened:

"Freedom from disease:
the foremost good fortune.
Unbinding:
the foremost ease.
The eightfold:
the foremost of paths
going to the Deathless, Secure."

"But now it has gradually become a verse of ordinary people.

"This body, Māgandiya, is a disease, a cancer, an arrow, painful, an affliction. And yet you say, with reference to this body, which is a disease, a cancer, an arrow, painful, an affliction: 'This is that freedom from disease, Master Gotama. This is that unbinding,' for you don't have the noble vision with which you would know freedom from disease and see unbinding."

"I'm convinced, Master Gotama, that you can teach me the Dhamma in such a way that I would know freedom from disease, that I would see unbinding."

"Māgandiya, it's just as if there were a man blind from birth who couldn't see black objects… white… blue… yellow… red… pink… the sun, or the moon. His friends, companions, & relatives would take him to a doctor. The doctor would concoct medicine for him, but in spite of the medicine his eyesight would not appear or grow clear. What do you think, Māgandiya? Would that doctor have nothing but his share of weariness & disappointment?"

"Yes, Master Gotama."

"In the same way, Māgandiya, if I were to teach you the Dhamma–'This is that freedom from disease; this is that unbinding'–and you on your part did not know freedom from disease or see unbinding, that would be wearisome for me; that would be troublesome for me."

"I'm convinced, Master Gotama, that you can teach me the Dhamma in such a way that I would know freedom from disease, that I would see unbinding."

"Māgandiya, it's just as if there were a man blind from birth who couldn't see black objects… white… blue… yellow… red… pink… the sun, or the moon. Now suppose that a certain man were to take a grimy, oil-stained rag and fool him, saying, 'Here, my good man, is a white cloth–beautiful, spotless, & clean.' The blind man would take it and put it on.

"Then his friends, companions, & relatives would take him to a doctor. The doctor would concoct medicine for him: purges from above & purges from below, ointments & counter-ointments and treatments through the nose. And thanks to the medicine his eyesight would appear & grow clear. Then together with the arising of his eyesight, he would abandon whatever passion & delight he felt for that grimy, oil-stained rag. And he would regard that man as an enemy & no friend at all, and think that he deserved to be killed. 'My gosh, how long have I been fooled, cheated, & deceived by that man & his grimy, oil-stained rag!–"Here, my good man, is a white cloth–beautiful, spotless, & clean."'

"In the same way, Māgandiya, if I were to teach you the Dhamma–'This is that freedom from Disease; this is that unbinding'–and you on your part were to know that freedom from Disease and see that unbinding, then together with the arising of your eyesight you would abandon whatever passion & delight you felt with regard for the five clinging-aggregates. And it would occur to you, 'My gosh, how long have I been fooled, cheated, & deceived by this mind! For in clinging, it was just form that I was clinging to… it was just feeling… just perception… just fabrications… just consciousness that I was clinging to. With my clinging as a requisite condition, there arises becoming… birth… aging-&-death… sorrow, lamentation, pains, distresses, & despairs. And thus is the origin of this entire mass of stress.'"

"I'm convinced, Master Gotama, that you can teach me the Dhamma in such a way that I might rise up from this seat cured of my blindness."

"In that case, Māgandiya, associate with people of integrity. When you associate with people of integrity, you will hear the true Dhamma. When you hear the true Dhamma, you will practice the Dhamma in accordance with the Dhamma. When you practice the Dhamma in accordance with the Dhamma, you will know & see for yourself: 'These things are diseases, cancers, arrows. And here is where diseases, cancers, & arrows cease without trace. With the cessation of that clinging of mine comes the cessation of becoming. With the cessation of becoming comes the cessation of birth. With the cessation of birth then aging-&-death, sorrow, lamentation, pain, distress, & despair all cease. Such is the cessation of this entire mass of suffering & stress.'"

SN 22:55 Exclamation (Udāna Sutta)

At Sāvatthī. There the Blessed One exclaimed this exclamation: "'It should not be, it should not occur to me [should not be mine]; it will not be, it will not occur to me [will not be mine]': A monk set on this would break the [five] lower fetters."

When this was said, a certain monk said to the Blessed One, "In what way would a monk set on this–'It should not be, it should not occur to me; it will not be, it will not occur to me'–break the [five] lower fetters?"[1]

"There is the case, monk, where an uninstructed run-of-the-mill person–who has no regard for noble ones, is not well-versed or disciplined in their Dhamma; who has no regard for people of integrity, is not well-versed or disciplined in their Dhamma–assumes form to be the self, or the self as possessing form, or form as in the self, or the self as in form.

"He assumes feeling to be the self, or the self as possessing feeling, or feeling as in the self, or the self as in feeling. He assumes perception to be the self, or the self as possessing perception, or perception as in the self, or the self as in perception. He assumes fabrications to be the self, or the self as possessing fabrications, or fabrications as in the self, or the self as in fabrications. He assumes consciousness to be the self, or the self as possessing consciousness, or consciousness as in the self, or the self as in consciousness.

"He doesn't discern, as it has come to be, inconstant form as 'inconstant form.' He doesn't discern, as it has come to be, inconstant feeling as 'inconstant feeling' … inconstant perception as 'inconstant perception' … inconstant fabrications as 'inconstant fabrications' … inconstant consciousness as 'inconstant consciousness.'

"He doesn't discern, as it has come to be, stressful form as 'stressful form' … stressful feeling as 'stressful feeling' … stressful perception as 'stressful perception' … stressful fabrications as 'stressful fabrications' … stressful consciousness as 'stressful consciousness.'

"He doesn't discern, as it has come to be, not-self form as 'not-self form' … not-self feeling as 'not-self feeling' … not-self perception as 'not-self perception' … not-self fabrications as 'not-self fabrications' … not-self consciousness as 'not-self consciousness.'

"He doesn't discern, as it has come to be, fabricated form as 'fabricated form' … fabricated feeling as 'fabricated feeling' … fabricated perception as 'fabricated perception' … fabricated fabrications as 'fabricated fabrications' … fabricated consciousness as 'fabricated consciousness.'

"He doesn't discern, as it has come to be, that 'form will stop becoming' … 'feeling will stop becoming' … 'perception will stop becoming' … 'fabrications will stop becoming' … 'consciousness will stop becoming.'

"Now, a well-instructed disciple of the noble ones–who has regard for noble ones, is well-versed & disciplined in their Dhamma; who has regard for people of integrity, is well-versed & disciplined in their Dhamma–doesn't assume form to be the self, or the self as possessing form, or form as in the self, or the self as in form. He doesn't assume feeling to be the self.… doesn't assume perception to be the self.… doesn't assume fabrications to be the self.… He doesn't assume consciousness to be the self, or the self as possessing consciousness, or consciousness as in the self, or the self as in consciousness.

"He discerns, as it has come to be, inconstant form as 'inconstant form' … inconstant feeling as 'inconstant feeling' … inconstant perception as 'inconstant perception' … inconstant fabrications as 'inconstant fabrications' … inconstant consciousness as 'inconstant consciousness.'

"He discerns, as it has come to be, stressful form as 'stressful form' … stressful feeling as 'stressful feeling' … stressful perception as 'stressful perception' … stressful fabrications as 'stressful fabrications' … stressful consciousness as 'stressful consciousness.'

"He discerns, as it has come to be, not-self form as 'not-self form' … not-self feeling as 'not-self feeling' … not-self perception as 'not-self perception' … not-self fabrications as 'not-self fabrications' … not-self consciousness as 'not-self consciousness.'

"He discerns, as it has come to be, fabricated form as 'fabricated form' … fabricated feeling as 'fabricated feeling' … fabricated perception as 'fabricated perception' … fabricated fabrications as 'fabricated fabrications' … fabricated consciousness as 'fabricated consciousness.'

"He discerns, as it has come to be, that 'form will stop becoming' … 'feeling will stop becoming' … 'perception will stop becoming' … 'fabrications will stop becoming' … 'consciousness will stop becoming.'

"From the non-becoming of form, from the non-becoming of feeling… of perception… of fabrications… of consciousness, a monk set on this–'It should not be, it should not occur to me; it will not be, it will not occur to me'–would break the [five] lower fetters."

"Lord, a monk set on this would break the [five] lower fetters. But for one knowing in what way, seeing in what way, is there the immediate ending of fermentations?"

"There is the case where an uninstructed run-of-the-mill person… falls into fear over what is not grounds for fear. There is fear for an uninstructed run-of-the-mill person [who thinks], 'It should not be, it should not occur to me; it will not be, it will not occur to me.' But an instructed disciple of the noble ones does not fall into fear over what is not grounds for fear. There is no fear for an instructed disciple of the noble ones [who thinks], 'It should not be, it should not occur to me; it will not be, it will not occur to me.'

"Should consciousness, when standing, stand attached to form, supported by form [as its object], landing on form, watered with delight, it would exhibit growth, increase, & proliferation.

"Should consciousness, when standing, stand attached to feeling, supported by feeling [as its object], landing on feeling, watered with delight, it would exhibit growth, increase, & proliferation.

"Should consciousness, when standing, stand attached to perception, supported by perception [as its object], landing on perception, watered with delight, it would exhibit growth, increase, & proliferation.

"Should consciousness, when standing, stand attached to fabrications, supported by fabrications [as its object], landing on fabrications, watered with delight, it would exhibit growth, increase, & proliferation.

"Were someone to say, 'I will describe a coming, a going, a passing away, an arising, a growth, an increase, or a proliferation of consciousness apart from form, from feeling, from perception, from fabrications,' that would be impossible.

"If a monk abandons passion for the property of form….

"If a monk abandons passion for the property of feeling….

"If a monk abandons passion for the property of perception….

"If a monk abandons passion for the property of fabrications….

"If a monk abandons passion for the property of consciousness, then owing to the abandonment of passion, the support is cut off, and there is no landing of consciousness. Consciousness, thus not having landed, not increasing, not concocting, is released. Owing to release, it is steady. Owing to steadiness, it is contented. Owing to contentment, it is not agitated. Not agitated, he [the monk] is totally unbound right within. He discerns that 'Birth is ended, the holy life fulfilled, the task done. There is nothing further for this world.'

"For one knowing in this way, seeing in this way, monk, there is the immediate ending of fermentations."

Note

1. The five lower fetters are self-identity views, uncertainty, grasping at habits & practices, sensual desire, and ill will.

From SN 56:11 The Tathāgata (Tathāgata Sutta)

That is what the Blessed One said. Gratified, the group of five monks delighted in the Blessed One's words. And while this explanation was being given, there arose to Ven. Koṇḍañña the dustless, stainless Dhamma eye: Whatever is subject to origination is all subject to cessation.

And when the Blessed One had set the Wheel of Dhamma in motion, the earth deities cried out: "At Vārāṇasī, in the Game Refuge at Isipatana, the Blessed One has set in motion the unexcelled Wheel of Dhamma that cannot be stopped by contemplative, brahman, deva, Māra, Brahmā, or anyone at all in the cosmos." On hearing the earth devas' cry, the Devas of the Four Kings took up the cry… On hearing the Devas of the Four Kings' cry, the Devas of the Thirty-three… the Devas of the Hours… the Contented devas… the Devas Who Enjoy Creation… the Devas Who Control the Creations of Others… the Devas of Brahmā's Retinue took up the cry: "At Vārāṇasī, in the Game Refuge at Isipatana, the Blessed One has set in motion the unexcelled Wheel of Dhamma that cannot be stopped by contemplative, brahman, deva, Māra, Brahmā or anyone at all in the cosmos."

So in that moment, that instant, the cry shot right up to the Brahma worlds. And this ten-thousand fold cosmos shivered & quivered & quaked, while a great, measureless radiance appeared in the cosmos, surpassing the effulgence of the devas.

Then the Blessed One exclaimed: "So you really know, Koṇḍañña? So you really know?" And that is how Ven. Koṇḍañña acquired the name Añña-Koṇḍañña–Koṇḍañña who knows.

Appendix Three: Saṁyutta Nikāya Passages

Sutta passages in Saṁyutta Nikāya 3 and 4 that may have originally been composed as udānas:

SN 3:8 = Ud 5:1

SN 3:9 Sacrifice (Yañña Sutta)

SN 3:10 Bonds (Bandhana Sutta)

SN 3:11 = Ud 6:2 but with a different verse

SN 3:14–15 A Battle (Saṅgāma Suttas)

SN 4:21 A Large Number (Sambahula Sutta)

Appendix Four: Disciples

Pre-eminent disciples of the Buddha mentioned in the Udāna, and the areas in which, according to AN 1:146–152 (as numbered in the Thai edition), they were pre-eminent:

(Those whose outstanding quality is depicted in the Udāna are marked with an asterisk.)

Monks (22 out of 40)

Ānanda: in being learned, being mindful, having powers of recall, having powers of retention, and being an attendant

Ānanda: in being learned, mindful, steadfast, in having wide understanding, and in being an attendant

Anuruddha: in the divine eye

Bāhiya of the Bark-cloth: in gaining quick realization*

Bhaddiya the Dwarf: in having a charming voice

Bhaddiya Kāḷigodhā's son: in coming from a prominent family

Dabba Mallaputta: in arranging lodgings

Kaccāna, Mahā: in explaining in detail the meaning of brief statements

Kappina, Mahā: in exhorting the monks

Kassapa, Mahā: in teaching strictness*

Koṇḍañña, Aññāta: in seniority

Koṭṭhita, Mahā: in attaining acumen

Moggallāna, Mahā: in having (psychic) power*

Nanda: in guarding the sense doors

Panthaka, Cūḷa: in creating a mind-made body and in being skilled in the evolution of awareness

Pilindavaccha: in being dear to devatas

Piṇḍola Bhāradvāja: in giving the lion's roar

Revata the Doubter: in possessing jhāna

Revata (Khadiravaniya = of the acacia grove): in living in the wilderness

Sāriputta: in having great discernment

Soṇa Koṭikaṇṇa: in having a fine delivery*

Subhūti: in living without conflict and in deserving offerings

Upasena Vaṅgantaputta: in being all-around inspiring

Female lay followers (3 out of 10)

Sāmāvatī: in dwelling in good will

Suppavāsā: in donating exquisite gifts*

Visākhā, Migāra's mother: in being a donor

Introduction to the Itivuttaka

Introduction

THE ITIVUTTAKA, a collection of 112 short discourses, takes its name from the statement at the beginning of each of its discourses: this (iti) was said (vuttaṁ) by the Blessed One. The collection as a whole is attributed to a laywoman named Khujjuttarā, who worked in the palace of King Udena of Kosambī as a servant to one of his queens, Sāmāvati. Because the Queen could not leave the palace to hear the Buddha's discourses, Khujjuttarā went in her place, memorized what the Buddha said, and then returned to the palace to teach the Queen and her 500 ladies-in-waiting. For her efforts, the Buddha cited Khujjuttarā as the foremost of his laywomen disciples in terms of her learning. She was also an effective teacher: when the inner apartments of the palace later burned down, killing the Queen and her entourage, the Buddha commented (in Udāna 7:10) that all of the women had reached at least the first stage of awakening.

The name of the Itivuttaka is included in the standard early list of the nine divisions of the Buddha's teachings–a list that predates the organization of the Pali Canon as we now know it. It's impossible to determine, though, the extent to which the extant Pali Itivuttaka corresponds to the Itivuttaka mentioned in that list. The Chinese canon contains a translation of an Itivuttaka, attributed to Hsüan-tsang, that strongly resembles the text of the Pali Itivuttaka, the major difference being that parts of the Group of Threes and all of the Group of Fours in the Pali are missing in Hsüan-tsang's translation. Either these parts were later additions to the text that found their way into the Pali but not into the Sanskrit version translated by Hsüan-tsang, or the Sanskrit text was incomplete, or Hsüan-tsang's translation–which dates from the last months of his life–was left unfinished.

The extant Pali Itivuttaka is composed of 112 itivuttakas (to distinguish between individual itivuttakas and the collection as a whole, the standard practice is to capitalize the latter and not the former.) The collection is organized into four groups, according to the number of items treated in each itivuttaka. Thus the Group of Ones contains itivuttakas treating one item; the Group of Twos, those treating two items, and so on up to four. In this way, the Itivuttaka resembles the Aṅguttara Nikāya in its method of organization.

And the resemblance goes beyond that. Many of the suttas in the Aṅguttara are composed of a prose passage followed by a verse summary of what's given in the prose. This was apparently one of the Buddha's techniques for helping his listeners remember his message. In the Itivuttaka, all of the passages follow this pattern: a prose passage, spoken by the Buddha to the monks, followed by a verse, also attributed to the Buddha, summarizing the prose passage. However, more often than not, the verses in the itivuttakas add extra information not covered in the prose. In most cases, the extra information is fairly minor, but in a few (such as §63), it's quite extensive. Because the prose passages are, in many instances, extremely short, this raises the question of whether they report entire discourses or simply gives the gist of those discourses. If just the gist, then perhaps the added information in the verse was actually treated in the full prose of the original discourse.

More than any other collection in the Canon, the Itivuttaka gives a sense of the Buddha's ability to recycle his material when composing verses. In some cases, entire verses are repeated (e.g., §15 and §105); in others, a verse composed on one topic is fitted to another topic simply with the change of a word or two (e.g., §§1-6). In still others, repeated cadences and lines help to round out verses on a variety of topics (§§52, 54, 56). Although this tendency may seem to indicate a lack of originality, it is not a flaw. It eases the task of listeners trying to memorize blocks of material, and points out parallels between subjects that otherwise might not be clear.

In terms of style, the Itivuttaka differs from its neighbors in the Khuddaka Nikāya–such as the Dhammapada and Udāna–in being less obviously shaped by literary considerations. Most of the prose and verse passages are straightforwardly didactic, and so the collection as a whole does not convey a strong literary "savor" (rasa), the aesthetic experience of an emotion that people in ancient India sought in literary works. However, the collection does contain occasional traces of a literary sensibility.

As an overall organizing principle, the final itivuttaka in each of the four groups conveys the astounding savor: the aesthetic experience conveyed by the portrayal of something astonishing. The Group of Ones ends with a passage (§27) on how good will for all beings is a victory excelling the victories of all the kings of the past; the Group of Twos ends with a passage (§49) on the Arahant's paradoxical avoidance of both becoming and non-becoming in mastering the path to awakening. The Group of Threes ends with a celebration (§99) of the Arahant as the true brahman; and the Group of Fours ends with an even more elaborate celebration (§112) of the many amazing qualities of the Buddha himself. In this way, even though the majority of passages in each group are not literary, the experience of reading (or listening to) each group ends on an aesthetically satisfying note.

Along the way, there are enough poetic figures to maintain interest with touches of aesthetic savor. Although some of these figures, such as alliteration, are hard to convey in translation, others survive the rendering from Pali into English. The most prominent figures are similes (§§27, 38, 60, 69, 74, 75, 76, 78, 82, 87, 89, 91, 92) and metaphors (§§38, 46, 57, 58, 59, 62, 68, 93, 96, 112), including one complete metaphor (§109). Another figure used is the lamp: a poetic figure in which one word, such as an adjective or a verb, functions in two or more different clauses or sentences. The name of this figure comes from the image of the different clauses or sentences "radiating" from the one word. Examples of lamps in the Itivuttaka are in §§27, 87, and 92. Other figures include narratives (§§22, 83, 89) distinctions (§§27, 112), etymologies (§112), an illustration (§92), a rhetorical question (§98), and praise (§§106, 107, 112). These figures provide a variety of aesthetic savors, although the military similes and metaphors (§§27, 46, 62, 67, 68, 69, 82), along with distinctions and praise, make the heroic savor dominant. Because, in the aesthetic tradition of the time, the heroic savor is supposed to shade into the astounding savor at the end of a work, this harmonizes with the overall organization of each group, noted above. Thus, even though the Itivuttaka is not a blatantly literary work, there is at least some aesthetic unity to the collection as a whole.

In terms of content, the itivuttakas cover the full range of Buddhist practice, with an emphasis on the very basic and very advanced stages. On the basic levels, the texts focus on the distinction between skillful and unskillful behavior. On the advanced, they treat such subtle topics as the role of becoming on the path (§49), the different aspects of Unbinding (§44), and the fact that an Arahant, having abandoned the All (§66; §68) cannot be classified in any way (§63; §69). In fact, many of the discussions about these more advanced points of the practice are found nowhere else in the Canon. If they had not been memorized, our knowledge of the Buddha's teachings would have been severely impoverished. Like Queen Sāmāvati and her entourage, we are in Khujjuttarā's debt.

Itivuttaka 1

This was said by the Blessed One, said by the Arahant, so I have heard: "Abandon one quality, monks, and I guarantee you non-return. Which one quality? Abandon greed as the one quality, and I guarantee you non-return."[1] This is the meaning of what the Blessed One said. So with regard to this it was said:[2]

The greed with which beings go to a bad destination,[3]
coveting:
from rightly knowing that greed,
those who see clearly
let go.
Letting go,
they never come to this world
again.

This, too, was the meaning of what was said by the Blessed One, so I have heard.[2]

Notes

1. Non-return: The third of the four levels of awakening. On reaching this level, one will never be reborn in this world. A non-returner who does not go on to attain Arahantship in this lifetime will be reborn in the Brahma worlds called the Pure Abodes and will attain nibbāna there.

2. These two statements are repeated in each itivuttaka. To avoid monotony, they are given here only in the first and last itivuttakas.

3. The bad destinations: rebirth in hell, as a hungry ghost, as an angry demon, or as a common animal. As with the good destinations–rebirth as a human being, in heaven, or in the Brahma worlds–these states are impermanent and dependent on kamma.

Itivuttaka 2

This was said by the Blessed One, said by the Arahant, so I have heard:
"Abandon one quality, monks, and I guarantee you non-return. Which one quality? Abandon aversion as the one quality, and I guarantee you non-return."

The aversion with which beings go to a bad destination,
upset:
from rightly knowing that aversion,
those who see clearly
let go.
Letting go,
they never come to this world
again.

Itivuttaka 3

This was said by the Blessed One, said by the Arahant, so I have heard:
"Abandon one quality, monks, and I guarantee you non-return. Which one quality? Abandon delusion as the one quality, and I guarantee you non-return."

The delusion with which beings go to a bad destination,
confused:
from rightly knowing that delusion,
those who see clearly
let go.
Letting go,
they never come to this world
again.

Itivuttaka 4

This was said by the Blessed One, said by the Arahant, so I have heard:
"Abandon one quality, monks, and I guarantee you non-return. Which one quality? Abandon anger as the one quality, and I guarantee you non-return."

The anger with which beings go to a bad destination,
enraged:
from rightly knowing that anger,
those who see clearly
let go.
Letting go,
they never come to this world
again.

Itivuttaka 5

This was said by the Blessed One, said by the Arahant, so I have heard:
"Abandon one quality, monks, and I guarantee you non-return. Which one quality? Abandon contempt as the one quality, and I guarantee you non-return."

The contempt with which beings go to a bad destination,
    disdainful:
from rightly knowing that contempt,
those who see clearly
        let go.
    Letting go,
they never come to this world
        again.

Itivuttaka 6

This was said by the Blessed One, said by the Arahant, so I have heard:
"Abandon one quality, monks, and I guarantee you non-return. Which one quality? Abandon conceit as the one quality, and I guarantee you non-return."

The conceit with which beings go to a bad destination,
        proud:
from rightly knowing that conceit,
those who see clearly
                let go.
        Letting go,
they never come to this world
                again.

Itivuttaka 7

This was said by the Blessed One, said by the Arahant, so I have heard: "Monks, one who has not fully known & fully understood the All,[1] whose mind has not been cleansed of passion for it, has not abandoned it, is incapable of putting an end to stress. But one who has fully known & fully understood the All, whose mind has been cleansed of passion for it and has abandoned it, is capable of putting an end to stress."

Knowing the All
    from all around,
not stirred by passion
    in all places:
he, having comprehended
    the All,
has gone beyond
    all stress.

Note

1. "The All" = the six senses (sight, hearing, smell, taste, touch, & ideation) and their respective objects. This covers every aspect of experience that can be described, but does not include nibbāna. For a full discussion of this point, see The Mind Like Fire Unbound, pp. 30—32.

Itivuttaka 8

This was said by the Blessed One, said by the Arahant, so I have heard: "Monks, one who has not fully known & fully understood conceit, whose mind has not been cleansed of passion for it, has not abandoned it, is incapable of putting an end to stress. But one who has fully known & fully understood conceit, whose mind has been cleansed of passion for it, has abandoned it, is capable of putting an end to stress."

People are possessed by conceit
    bound with conceit delighted with becoming.
Not comprehending conceit, they come to further becoming.
But those who, letting go of conceit, are, in its destruction, released, conquering the bond of conceit, go beyond
all bonds.

Itivuttaka 9

This was said by the Blessed One, said by the Arahant, so I have heard: "Monks, one who has not fully known & fully understood greed, whose mind has not been cleansed of passion for it, has not abandoned it, is incapable of putting an end to stress. But one who has fully known & fully understood greed, who has detached his mind from it and let go of it, is capable of putting an end to stress."

The greed with which beings go to a bad destination,
        coveting:
from rightly knowing that greed,
those who see clearly
                let go.
        Letting go,
they never come to this world
                again.

Itivuttaka 10—13

This was said by the Blessed One, said by the Arahant, so I have heard: "Monks, one who has not fully known & fully understood aversion… delusion… anger… contempt, whose mind has not been cleansed of passion for it, has not abandoned it, is incapable of putting an end to stress. But one who has fully known & fully understood aversion… delusion… anger… contempt, whose mind has been cleansed of passion for it and has abandoned it, is capable of putting an end to stress.

[The verses for these discourses are identical with those for §§2—5.]

Itivuttaka 14

This was said by the Blessed One, said by the Arahant, so I have heard: "Monks, I don't envision even one other hindrance–hindered by which people go wandering & transmigrating on for a long, long time–like the hindrance of ignorance. Hindered by the hindrance of ignorance, people go wandering & transmigrating on for a long, long time."

No one other thing
so hinders people
that they wander on, day & night, as when they're obstructed by delusion.
But those who, letting go of delusion, shatter the mass of darkness, wander   no further.
    Their cause isn't found.

Itivuttaka 15

This was said by the Blessed One, said by the Arahant, so I have heard: "Monks, I don't envision even one other fetter–fettered by which beings conjoined go wandering & transmigrating on for a long, long time–like the fetter of craving. Fettered with the fetter of craving, beings conjoined go wandering & transmigrating on for a long, long time."

> With craving his companion, a man
> wanders on a long, long time.
> Neither in this state here
> nor anywhere else
> does he go beyond
> the wandering-on.
> Knowing this drawback–
> that craving brings stress into play–
> free from craving,
> devoid of clinging,
> mindful, the monk
> lives the mendicant life.

Itivuttaka 16

This was said by the Blessed One, said by the Arahant, so I have heard: "Monks, with regard to internal factors, I don't envision any other single factor like appropriate attention[1] as doing so much for a monk in training,[2] who has not attained the heart's aspiration but remains intent on the unsurpassed safety from bondage.[3] A monk who attends appropriately abandons what is unskillful and develops what is skillful.

Appropriate attention as a quality
of a monk in training:
nothing else
does so much
for attaining the superlative goal.
A monk, striving appropriately, attains the ending of stress.

Notes

1. Appropriate attention (yoniso manasikāra) is the ability to focus attention on questions that lead to the end of suffering. MN 2 lists the following questions as not fit for attention: "Was I in the past? Was I not in the past? What was I in the past? How was I in the past? … Shall I be in the future? Shall I not be in the future? What shall I be in the future? How shall I be in the future? … Am I? Am I not? What am I? How am I? Where has this being come from? Where is it bound?" The discourse also lists the following issues as fit for attention: "This is stress. This is the origination of stress. This is the cessation of stress. This is the way leading to the cessation of stress." Other passages show that appropriate attention views experience not only in terms of the four noble truths, but also in terms of the duties appropriate to those truths. See SN 22:122 and SN 46:51.

2. A person "in training" is one who has attained at least the first level of awakening, but not yet the final level.

3. Bondage = the four yokes: sensual passion, becoming, views, & ignorance.

Itivuttaka 17

This was said by the Blessed One, said by the Arahant, so I have heard: "Monks, with regard to external factors, I don't envision any other single factor like friendship with admirable people[1] as doing so much for a monk in training, who has not attained the heart's aspiration but remains intent on the unsurpassed safety from bondage. A monk who is a friend with admirable people abandons what is unskillful and develops what is skillful."

A monk who's a friend to admirable people
–who's reverential, respectful, doing what his friends advise–
mindful, alert,
attains step by step
    the ending of all fetters.

Note

1. In SN 45:2 the Buddha says, "Having admirable people (kalyāṇa-mitta) as friends, companions, and colleagues is actually the whole of the holy life. When a monk has admirable people as friends, companions, and colleagues, he may be expected to develop and pursue the noble eightfold path.… It's in dependence on me as an admirable friend that beings subject to birth have gained release from birth… aging… death… sorrow, lamentation, pain, distress, and despair."

Itivuttaka 18

This was said by the Blessed One, said by the Arahant, so I have heard: "One thing, monks, when arising in the world, arises for the detriment of many, for the unhappiness of many, for the detriment & unhappiness of many beings, both human & divine. Which one thing? Schism in the Saṅgha. When the Saṅgha is split, there are arguments with one another, there is abuse of one another, ganging up on one another, abandoning of one another. There those with little confidence [in the teaching] lose all confidence, while some of those who are confident become otherwise."

Doomed for an eon
        to deprivation,
                to hell:
one who has split the Saṅgha.
        Delighting in factions, unjudicious–
        he's barred
from safety from bondage.
Having split a Saṅgha in concord, he cooks for an eon
        in hell.

Itivuttaka 19

This was said by the Blessed One, said by the Arahant, so I have heard: "One thing, monks, when arising in the world, arises for the welfare of many, for the happiness of many, for the welfare & happiness of many beings, both human & divine. Which one thing? Concord in the Saṅgha. When the Saṅgha is in concord, there are no arguments with one another, no abuse of one another, no ganging up on one another, no abandoning of one another. There those with little confidence [in the teaching] become confident, while those already confident become even more so."

Blissful is concord in the Saṅgha.
One who assists in concord– delighting in concord,
    judicious–
isn't barred from safety from bondage.
Having brought concord to the Saṅgha, he rejoices for an eon
    in heaven.

Itivuttaka 20

This was said by the Blessed One, said by the Arahant, so I have heard: "Monks, there is the case where a certain person is corrupt-minded. Having encompassed that mind with [my] awareness, I discern, 'If this person were to die at this instant, then as if he were to be carried off, he would thus be placed in hell.' Why is that? Because his mind is corrupt. It's because of corrupt-mindedness that there are cases where beings–at the break-up of the body, after death–reappear in a plane of deprivation, a bad destination, a lower realm, hell."

Knowing the case
of a corrupt-minded person,
the One Awakened explained its meaning
in the presence of the monks.
If that person
were to die at this instant, he'd reappear in hell because his mind is corrupt–
    as if he were carried off
    and placed there.
It's because of corrupt-mindedness that beings go
    to a bad destination.

Itivuttaka 21

This was said by the Blessed One, said by the Arahant, so I have heard: "Monks, there is the case where a certain person is clear-minded. Having encompassed that mind with [my] awareness, I discern, 'If this person were to die at this instant, then as if he were to be carried off, he would thus be placed in heaven.' Why is that? Because his mind is clear. It's because of clear-mindedness that there are cases where some beings–at the break-up of the body, after death–reappear in a heavenly world."

Knowing the case
of a clear-minded person,
the One Awakened explained its meaning
in the presence of the monks.
If that person
were to die at this instant, he'd reappear in heaven because his mind is clear–
    as if he were carried off
    and placed there.
It's because of clear-mindedness
    that beings go
    to a good destination.

Itivuttaka 22

This was said by the Blessed One, said by the Arahant, so I have heard: "Monks, don't be afraid of acts of merit. This is a synonym for what is blissful, desirable, pleasing, endearing, charming–i.e., acts of merit. I directly know that, having long performed meritorious deeds, I long experienced desirable, pleasing, endearing, charming results. Having developed a mind of good will for seven years, then for seven eons of contraction & expansion I didn't return to this world. Whenever the eon was contracting, I entered the [realm of] Radiance. Whenever the eon was expanding, I reappeared in an empty Brahma-abode. There I was Brahma, the Great Brahma, the Unconquered Conqueror, Total Seer, Wielder of Power. Then for thirty-six times I was Sakka, ruler of the gods. For many hundreds of times I was a king, a wheel-turning emperor, a righteous king of Dhamma, conqueror of the four corners of the earth, maintaining stable control over the countryside, endowed with the seven treasures[1] –to say nothing of the times I was a local king. The thought occurred to me, 'Of what action of mine is this the fruit, of what action the result, that I now have such great power & might?' Then the thought occurred to me, 'This is the fruit of my three [types of] action, the result of three types of action, that I now have such great power & might: i.e., generosity, self-control, & restraint.'"

> Train in acts of merit
> that yield the foremost profit of bliss–
> develop generosity,
> a life in tune,
> a mind of good will.
> Developing these
> three things
> that bring about bliss,
> the wise reappear

in a world of bliss
unalloyed.

Note

1. The seven treasures are a divine wheel, an ideal jewel, an ideal elephant, an ideal horse, an ideal wife, an ideal treasurer, an ideal counselor.

Itivuttaka 23

This was said by the Blessed One, said by the Arahant, so I have heard: "This one quality, monks, when developed & pursued, keeps both kinds of benefit secure: benefit in this life & in lives to come. Which one quality? Heedfulness with regard to skillful qualities. This is the one quality that, when developed & pursued, keeps both kinds of benefit secure: benefit in this life & in lives to come."

They praise heedfulness, the wise, in doing acts of merit.
When heedful, wise,
you achieve both kinds of benefit:
    benefits in this life, & benefits in lives to come.

By breaking through to your benefit, you're called enlightened,
    wise.

Itivuttaka 24

This was said by the Blessed One, said by the Arahant, so I have heard: "Monks, if a single person were to wander & transmigrate on for an eon, he/she would leave behind a chain of bones, a pile of bones, a heap of bones, as large as this Mount Vepulla, if there were someone to collect them and the collection were not destroyed."

The accumulation of a single person's bones for an eon
would be a heap
on a par with the mountain, so said the Great Seer.
    (He declared this to be the great Mount Vepulla to the north of Vulture Peak in the mountain-ring of the Magadhans.)[1]
But when that person sees with right discernment
the four Noble Truths–
    stress,
    the cause of stress,
    the transcending of stress,
    & the noble eightfold path,
    the way to the stilling of stress– having wandered on seven times at most, then,
    with the ending of all fetters, he makes an end
        of stress.

Note

1. Magadha was a kingdom in the time of the Buddha, corresponding roughly to the present day state of Bihar. Its capital city, Rājagaha, was surrounded by a ring of five mountains. Vulture Peak, a secluded rock outcrop in the middle of the ring, was a spot frequented by the Buddha.

Itivuttaka 25

This was said by the Blessed One, said by the Arahant, so I have heard: "Monks, for the person who transgresses in one thing, I tell you, there is no evil deed that is not to be done. Which one thing? This: telling a deliberate lie."

> For the person who lies,
> who transgresses in this one thing,
> transcending concern for the world beyond:
> there's no evil
> not to be done.

Itivuttaka 26

This was said by the Blessed One, said by the Arahant, so I have heard: "Monks, if beings knew, as I know, the results of giving & sharing, they would not eat without having given, nor would the stain of selfishness overcome their minds. Even if it were their last bite, their last mouthful, they would not eat without having shared, if there were someone to receive their gift. But because beings do not know, as I know, the results of giving & sharing, they eat without having given. The stain of selfishness overcomes their minds."

If beings knew what the Great Seer said, how the result of sharing has such great fruit, then, subduing the stain of selfishness with brightened awareness, they'd give in season
    to the noble ones,
    where a gift bears great fruit.
Having given food
    as an offering
    to those worthy of offerings, many donors,
when they pass away from here,
    the human state,
go
    to heaven.
They, having gone there
    to heaven,
    rejoice,
    enjoying sensual pleasures.

Unselfish, they partake of the result of sharing.

Itivuttaka 27

This was said by the Blessed One, said by the Arahant, so I have heard: "Monks, all the grounds for making merit leading to spontaneously arising [in heaven] do not equal one-sixteenth of the awareness-release through good will. Good will–surpassing them–shines, blazes, & dazzles.

"Just as the radiance of all the stars does not equal one-sixteenth of the radiance of the moon, as the moon–surpassing them–shines, blazes, & dazzles, even so, all the grounds for making merit leading to spontaneously arising [in heaven] do not equal one-sixteenth of the awareness-release through good will. Good will–surpassing them–shines, blazes, & dazzles.

"Just as in the last month of the rains, in autumn, when the sky is clear & cloudless, the sun, on ascending the sky, overpowers the space immersed in darkness, shines, blazes, & dazzles, even so, all the grounds for making merit leading to spontaneously arising [in heaven] do not equal one-sixteenth of the awareness-release through good will. Good will–surpassing them–shines, blazes, & dazzles.

"Just as in the last stage of the night the morning star shines, blazes, & dazzles, even so, all the grounds for making merit leading to spontaneously arising [in heaven] do not equal one-sixteenth of the awareness-release through good will. Good will–surpassing them–shines, blazes, & dazzles."

When one develops–mindful– good will without limit, fetters are worn through,
on seeing the ending
of acquisitions.

If with uncorrupted mind you feel good will

for even one being,
you become skilled from that.
But a noble one produces a mind of sympathy
for all beings,
an abundance of merit.

Kingly seers, who conquered the earth swarming with beings,
went about making sacrifices:
the horse sacrifice, human sacrifice,
water rites, soma rites, & the "Unobstructed," but these don't equal
one sixteenth
of a well-developed mind of good will–
as all the constellations don't,
one sixteenth
of the radiance of the moon.

One who neither kills
nor gets others to kill,
neither conquers,
nor gets others to conquer, with good will for all beings, has no hostility with anyone
at all.

Itivuttaka 28

This was said by the Blessed One, said by the Arahant, so I have heard:
"Endowed with two things, monks, a monk lives in stress in the present life–troubled, distressed, & feverish–and at the break-up of the body, after death, a bad destination can be expected. Which two? A lack of guarding of the doors of the sense faculties, and knowing no moderation in food. Endowed with these two things, a monk lives in stress in the present life–troubled, distressed, & feverish–and at the break-up of the body, after death, a bad destination can be expected."

Eye & ear & nose,
tongue, body & mind:
when a monk leaves these doors unguarded
    –knowing no moderation in food, not restraining his senses–
he experiences stress:
    stress in body, stress
    in mind.
Burning in body,
burning in mind,
    whether by day or by night,
    one like this
    lives in suffering & stress.

Itivuttaka 29

This was said by the Blessed One, said by the Arahant, so I have heard:
"Endowed with two things, monks, a monk lives in ease in the present life–untroubled, undistressed, & unfeverish–and at the break-up of the body, after death, a good destination can be expected. Which two? A guarding of the doors of the sense faculties, and knowing moderation in food. Endowed with these two things, a monk lives in ease in the present life–untroubled, undistressed, & unfeverish–and at the break-up of the body, after death, a good destination can be expected."

Eye & ear & nose,
tongue, body, & mind:
when a monk has these doors well guarded
–knowing moderation in food, restraining his senses–
he experiences ease:
    ease in body, ease
    in mind.
Not burning in body,
not burning in mind,
    whether by day or by night,
    one like this
    lives in ease.

Itivuttaka 30

This was said by the Blessed One, said by the Arahant, so I have heard: "Monks, there are these two things that cause remorse. Which two? There is the case of the person who has not done what is admirable, has not done what is skillful, has not given protection to those in fear, and instead has done what is evil, savage, & cruel. Thinking, 'I have not done what is admirable,' he feels remorse. Thinking, 'I have done what is evil,' he feels remorse. These are the two things that cause remorse."

Having engaged
in bodily misconduct,
verbal misconduct,
misconduct of mind,[1]
or whatever else is flawed,
not having done what is skillful,
having done much that is not,
at the break-up of the body,
the undiscerning one reappears in hell.

Note

1. AN 10:176 defines bodily misconduct as killing, stealing, and sexual misconduct; verbal misconduct as lies, divisive speech, harsh speech, and idle chatter; and mental misconduct as covetousness, ill will, and wrong views (see the note to §32).

See also: AN 4:184

Itivuttaka 31

This was said by the Blessed One, said by the Arahant, so I have heard: "Monks, there are these two things that cause no remorse. Which two? There is the case of the person who has done what is admirable, has done what is skillful, has given protection to those in fear, and has done nothing that is evil, savage, or cruel. Thinking, 'I have done what is admirable,' he feels no remorse. Thinking, 'I have not done what is evil,' he feels no remorse. These are the two things that cause no remorse."

Having abandoned
    bodily misconduct,
    verbal misconduct,
    misconduct of mind,
    & whatever else is flawed,
not having done what's not skillful,
having done much that is,
at the break-up of the body,
the discerning one reappears
        in heaven.

Itivuttaka 32

This was said by the Blessed One, said by the Arahant, so I have heard:
"Endowed with two things, monks, a person–as if carried off–is thus placed in hell. Which two? Evil habits & evil views. Endowed with these two things, a person–as if carried off–is thus placed in hell."

Evil habits & evil views:[1]
a person, undiscerning,
endowed with these two things,
at the break-up of the body
reappears in hell.

Note

1. MN 22 gives the following example of an evil view: "As I understand the Dhamma taught by the Blessed One, those acts the Blessed One says are obstructive, when indulged in, are not genuine obstructions." MN 38 gives another example: "As I understand the Dhamma taught by the Blessed One, it is just this consciousness that runs and wanders on [from birth to birth], not another."

Itivuttaka 33

This was said by the Blessed One, said by the Arahant, so I have heard:
"Endowed with two things, monks, a person–as if carried off–is thus placed in heaven. Which two? Auspicious habits & auspicious views. Endowed with these two things, a person–as if carried off–is thus placed in heaven."

Auspicious habits & auspicious views:
a person, discerning,
endowed with these two things,
at the break-up of the body
reappears in heaven.

Itivuttaka 34

This was said by the Blessed One, said by the Arahant, so I have heard: "Monks, a person without ardency, without compunction, is incapable of self-awakening, incapable of Unbinding, incapable of attaining the unsurpassed safety from bondage. A person ardent & compunctious is capable of self-awakening, capable of Unbinding, capable of attaining the unsurpassed safety from bondage."

With no ardency, no
compunction,
lazy, with low persistence,
full of sloth & drowsiness, shameless, without respect:
he's incapable,
a monk like this,
of touching superlative
self-awakening.

But whoever is mindful, masterful,
absorbed in jhāna,
ardent, concerned, & heedful,
cutting the fetter of birth & aging,
touches right here
a self-awakening un-
surpassed.

Itivuttaka 35

This was said by the Blessed One, said by the Arahant, so I have heard: "Monks, this holy life is lived, not for the sake of deceiving people, not for the sake of inveigling people, not for the sake of the rewards of gain, offerings, & tribute, nor with the thought, 'Thus may people know me.' This holy life is lived for the sake of restraint & abandoning."

For the sake of restraint, for the sake of abandoning,
he, the Blessed One, taught
a holy life not handed down,[1]
    coming ashore
    in Unbinding.

This path is pursued
    by those great in purpose,
    great seers.
Those who follow it,
as taught by the One Awakened,
heeding the Teacher's message,
    will put an end
        to suffering & stress.

Note

1. "Not handed down": not derived from an ancient tradition, and not dependent on ancient tradition for its authority.

This itivuttaka is nearly identical with AN 4:25.

Itivuttaka 36

This was said by the Blessed One, said by the Arahant, so I have heard: "Monks, this holy life is lived, not for the sake of deceiving people, not for the sake of inveigling people, not for the sake of the rewards of gain, offerings, & tribute, nor with the thought, 'Thus may people know me.' This holy life is lived for the sake of direct knowledge[1] & full comprehension."

For the sake of direct knowledge & full comprehension,
he, the Blessed One, taught
a holy life not handed down,
    coming ashore
    in Unbinding.

This path is pursued
    by those great in purpose,
    great seers.
Those who follow it,
as taught by the One Awakened,
heeding the Teacher's message,
    will put an end
        to suffering & stress.

Note

1. Direct knowledge = abhiññā. The Canon lists six types of abhiññā: psychic powers, clairaudience, the ability to read the minds of others, recollection of past lives, clairvoyance, and–most important of all–knowledge of the ending of the mental effluents.

Itivuttaka 37

This was said by the Blessed One, said by the Arahant, so I have heard:
"Endowed with two things, monks, a monk lives full of ease in the here-&-now and is appropriately aroused for the ending of the effluents. Which two? A sense of urgency toward things that should inspire urgency[1] and, feeling urgency, appropriate exertion. Endowed with these two things, a monk lives full of ease in the here-&-now and is appropriately aroused for the ending of the effluents."

Feeling urgency right here toward what should inspire urgency,
the wise,
masterful,
ardent monk
should investigate
with discernment.
One who lives thus ardently,
not restlessly, at peace,
committed to awareness-tranquility, would attain the ending
of suffering & stress.

Note

1. Urgency = saṁvega. Other meanings for this term include awe, shock, dismay, and alienation. In the Pali Canon, this emotion is often accompanied by fear and a sensed need to escape from overwhelming danger. The things that should inspire urgency are the first four of the five reflections listed in AN 5:57: "I am subject to aging, have not gone beyond aging. I am subject to illness, have not gone beyond illness. I am subject to death, have not gone beyond death. I will grow different, separate from all that is dear & appealing to me." Appropriate exertion is indicated by the fifth reflection: "I am the owner of actions, heir to actions, born of actions, related through actions, and have actions as my arbitrator. Whatever I do, for good or for evil, to that will I fall heir."

Itivuttaka 38

This was said by the Blessed One, said by the Arahant, so I have heard: "Monks, two trains of thought often occur to the Tathāgata, worthy & rightly self-awakened: the thought of safety & that of seclusion.

"The Tathāgata enjoys non-ill will, delights in non-ill will. To him–enjoying non-ill will, delighting in non-ill will–this thought often occurs: 'By this activity I harm no one at all, whether weak or firm.'

"The Tathāgata enjoys seclusion, delights in seclusion. To him–enjoying seclusion, delighting in seclusion–this thought often occurs: 'Whatever is unskillful is abandoned.'

"Thus, monks, you too should live enjoying non-ill will, delighting in non-ill will. To you–enjoying non-ill will, delighting in non-ill will–this thought will often occur: 'By this activity we harm no one at all, whether weak or firm.'

"You too should live enjoying seclusion, delighting in seclusion. To you–enjoying seclusion, delighting in seclusion–this thought will often occur: 'What is unskillful? What is not yet abandoned? What are we abandoning?'"

To the Tathāgata,
awakened,
who endured what is hard to endure,
two thoughts occur:
safety
the first thought mentioned; seclusion
the second declared.

The dispeller of darkness, free
of effluent,

the great seer
who has gone beyond,
reached attainment,
gained mastery,
crossed over the poisons;
who's released in the ending of craving:

that sage

bears his last body,
has shaken off Māra, I tell you,
has gone beyond aging.

As one standing on a rocky crag would see the people all around below, so the wise one,
with the all-around eye,
having scaled the tower made of Dhamma,
having crossed over sorrow,
gazes on those overwhelmed with sorrow, conquered by aging & death.

Itivuttaka 39

This was said by the Blessed One, said by the Arahant, so I have heard: "Monks, the Tathāgata–worthy & rightly self-awakened–has two Dhamma discourses given in sequence. Which two? 'See evil as evil.' This is the first Dhamma discourse. 'Having seen evil as evil, become disenchanted there, dispassionate there, released.' This is the second Dhamma discourse. These are the two Dhamma discourses that the Tathāgata–worthy & rightly self-awakened–has given in sequence."

See the two statements, declared in sequence,
by the Tathāgata,
awakened, sympathetic
to all beings.
The first: see evil.
Be dispassionate there
toward evil.
Then, with a mind dispassionate,
you will make an end
of suffering & stress.

Itivuttaka 40

This was said by the Blessed One, said by the Arahant, so I have heard: "Monks, ignorance[1] precedes the arrival of unskillful qualities; lack of shame & lack of compunction[2] follow after. Clear knowing precedes the arrival of skillful qualities; shame & compunction follow after."

Any bad destinations
in this world, in the next, are rooted in ignorance–all– accumulations of desire & greed.

And when a person of evil desires lacks shame & respect, evil comes from that,
and by that he goes
to deprivation.

So cleansing away
ignorance, desire, & greed, a monk giving rise to clear knowing would abandon all bad destinations.

Notes

1. Ignorance (avijjā) means ignorance of stress, its origination, its cessation, and the way leading to its cessation.

2. Shame (hiri) means a healthy sense of shame–derived from self-esteem–at the idea of doing evil. Compunction (ottappa) means fear of the consequences of doing evil.

Itivuttaka 41

This was said by the Blessed One, said by the Arahant, so I have heard: "Monks, those beings are truly deprived who are deprived of noble discernment. They live in stress in the present life–troubled, distressed, & feverish–and at the break-up of the body, after death, a bad destination can be expected.

"Those beings are not deprived who are not deprived of noble discernment. They live in ease in the present life–untroubled, undistressed, & not feverish–and at the break-up of the body, after death, a good destination can be expected.

Look at the world –including its heavenly beings:
deprived of discernment,
making an abode in name-&-form,
it conceives that 'This is the truth.'
The best discernment in the world is what leads to penetration,
for it rightly discerns
the total ending of birth & becoming.

Human & heavenly beings hold them dear:
those who are
self-awakened,
mindful,
bearing their last bodies with joyful discernment.

Itivuttaka 42

This was said by the Blessed One, said by the Arahant, so I have heard: "Monks, these two bright qualities safeguard the world. Which two? Shame & compunction. If these two bright qualities did not safeguard the world, there would be no discerning of "mother," "aunt," "uncle's wife," "teacher's wife," or "wife of those deserving respect." The world would fall into promiscuity, like rams with goats, roosters with pigs, or dogs with jackals. But because these two bright qualities do safeguard the world, there is the discerning of "mother," "aunt," "uncle's wife," "teacher's wife," & "wife of those deserving respect."

Those in whom shame & compunction
are not always found have strayed
        from the bright root,
    are headed
        to birth & death.
But those in whom shame & compunction
always are rightly established, who are mature in the holy life:
        they are calm,
    their further becoming ended.

Itivuttaka 43

This was said by the Blessed One, said by the Arahant, so I have heard: "There is, monks, an unborn[1]–unbecome–unmade–unfabricated. If there were not that unborn–unbecome–unmade–unfabricated, there would not be the case that escape from the born–become–made–fabricated would be discerned. But precisely because there is an unborn–unbecome–unmade–unfabricated, escape from the born–become–made–fabricated is thus discerned."

> The born, become, produced,
> made, fabricated, impermanent,
> fabricated of aging & death,
> a nest of illnesses, perishing,
> come-into-being through nourishment
> and the guide [that is craving]–
> is unfit for delight.
>
> The escape from that
> is > peaceful, permanent,
> a sphere beyond conjecture,
> unborn, unproduced,
> the sorrowless, stainless state,
> the cessation of stressful qualities,
> stilling-of-fabrications bliss.

Note

1. Some scholars have argued that the term "unborn" cannot be used to distinguish Unbinding from transmigration, as there are discourses (such as SN 15:3) stating that transmigration itself has no beginning point, implying that it too is unborn. Thus they argue that in this passage the term ajātaṁ, although a past participle, should be translated as, "without birth." However, this argument is based on two questionable premises. First, it assumes that Unbinding is here being contrasted with transmigration, even though the passage simply contrasts it with the fabricated. Secondly, even assuming that the phrase "the born—the become," etc., is a reference to transmigration, the scholars' argument is based on a misreading of SN 15:3. There, transmigration is said to have an "inconceivable" or "undiscoverable" beginning point. This is very different from saying that it is unborn. If transmigration were unborn, it would be unfabricated (see AN 3:47), which is obviously not the case. Thus, in translating this term to describe Unbinding, I have maintained the straight grammatical reading, "unborn."

Itivuttaka 44

This was said by the Blessed One, said by the Arahant, so I have heard: "Monks, there are these two forms of the Unbinding property. Which two? The Unbinding property with fuel remaining, & the Unbinding property with no fuel remaining.

"And what is the Unbinding property with fuel remaining? There is the case where a monk is an Arahant whose effluents have ended, who has reached fulfillment, finished the task, laid down the burden, attained the true goal, destroyed the fetter of becoming, and is released through right gnosis. His five sense faculties still remain and, owing to their being intact, he experiences the pleasing & the displeasing, and is sensitive to pleasure & pain. His ending of passion, aversion, & delusion is termed the Unbinding property with fuel remaining.[1]

"And what is the Unbinding property with no fuel remaining? There is the case where a monk is an Arahant whose effluents have ended, who has reached fulfillment, finished the task, laid down the burden, attained the true goal, destroyed the fetter of becoming, and is released through right gnosis. For him, all that is sensed, being unrelished, will grow cold right here. This is termed the Unbinding property with no fuel remaining."[1]

These two proclaimed
by the one with vision, Unbinding properties
the one independent,
the one who is Such:[2]
one property, here in this life, with fuel remaining
from the destruction of [craving],
the guide to becoming,

and that with no fuel remaining,
after this life,
in which all becoming totally ceases.

Those who know
this unfabricated state, their minds released
through the destruction of [craving],
the guide to becoming,
they, attaining the Dhamma's heartwood, delighting in ending,[3]
have abandoned all becoming:
they, the Such.

Notes

1. With fuel remaining (sa-upādisesa) and with no fuel remaining (anupādisesa): The analogy here is to a fire. In the first case, the flames are out, but the embers are still glowing. In the second, the fire is so thoroughly out that the embers have grown cold. The "fuel" here is the five aggregates (see the Glossary). While the Arahant is still alive, he/she still experiences the five aggregates, but they do not burn with the fires of passion, aversion, or delusion. When the Arahant passes away, there is no longer any experience of aggregates here or anywhere else. For a discussion of this point, see The Mind Like Fire Unbound, pp. 21-37.

2. Such (tādin): An adjective to describe one who has attained the goal. It indicates that the person's state is undefinable and not subject to change or influence of any sort.

3. Following the reading in the Burmese and PTS editions: dhamma-sārādigamā khaye ratā. The Thai edition reads, dhamma-sārādigamakkhaye ratā–delighting in the ending of the attaining of the Dhamma's heartwood–which doesn't make sense. See MN 29 & MN 30.

Itivuttaka 45

This was said by the Blessed One, said by the Arahant, so I have heard: "Monks, live enjoying aloofness, delighting in aloofness, inwardly committed to awareness-tranquility, not neglecting jhāna, endowed with clear-seeing insight, and frequenting empty buildings. As you live enjoying aloofness, delighting in aloofness, inwardly committed to awareness-tranquility, not neglecting jhāna, endowed with clear-seeing insight, and frequenting empty buildings, then one of two fruits can be expected: either gnosis right in the here-&-now, or–if there be any remnant of clinging-sustenance–non-return."

Those with calm minds–
masterful,
mindful,
absorbed in jhāna–
clearly see Dhamma rightly, not intent on sensual pleasures.
Delighting in heedfulness,
calm,
seeing danger in heedlessness, they –incapable of falling away– are right in the presence of Unbinding.

See also: MN 6

Itivuttaka 46

This was said by the Blessed One, said by the Arahant, so I have heard: "Monks, live with the trainings [in heightened virtue, heightened mind, & heightened discernment] as your reward, with discernment uppermost, release the essence, & mindfulness the governing principle. As you live with the trainings as your reward, with discernment uppermost, release the essence, & mindfulness the governing principle, then one of two fruits can be expected: either gnosis right in the here-&-now, or–if there be any remnant of clinging-sustenance–non-return."

Complete in the training, not subject to falling away,[1] one with discernment
    uppermost,
seeing the stopping, the ending of birth:
    that sage
bears his last body,
has shaken off Māra, I tell you,
has gone beyond aging.
    So, always
delighting in jhāna,
    centered,
    ardent,
seeing the stopping, the ending of birth, conquering Māra, along with his armies,[2] monks,
be gone-beyond aging & death.

Notes

1. Following the reading found in one of the Sri Lankan editions: aparihāna-dhammaṁ. The Thai, Burmese, and another Sri Lankan edition read: apahāna-dhammaṁ, "not subject to abandoning," which fits the meter better, but not the sense of the verse. The Commentary interprets the more common reading as meaning "not subject to falling away," but it doesn't explain how this can be so.

2. Sn 3:2 identifies Māra's armies as: sensual passions; discontent; hunger & thirst; craving; sloth & torpor; terror; uncertainty; hypocrisy & stubbornness; gains, offerings, fame, & status; and the attitude that praises self while disparaging others.

Itivuttaka 47

This was said by the Blessed One, said by the Arahant, so I have heard: "Monks, a monk should be wakeful: mindful, alert, centered, sensitive, clear, & calm. And there he should, at the appropriate times, see clearly into skillful mental qualities. For a monk who is wakeful–mindful, alert, centered, sensitive, clear, & calm, seeing clearly, at the appropriate times, into skillful mental qualities–one of two fruits can be expected: either gnosis right in the here-&-now, or–if there be any remnant of clinging-sustenance–non-return."

Those who are wakeful, listen to this!
Those who are sleeping, wake up!
Wakefulness is better than sleep.
For those who are wakeful, there's no danger, no fear.
Whoever is wakeful,
    mindful, alert,
    centered, sensitive,
    calm, & clear,
rightly exploring the Dhamma
at appropriate times,
he–on becoming unified– could shatter the darkness.

So be devoted to wakefulness.
The ardent monk
–masterful, acquiring jhāna, cutting the fetter of birth & aging–
touches right here
a self-awakening un-
    surpassed.

Itivuttaka 48

This was said by the Blessed One, said by the Arahant, so I have heard: "Monks, these two are doomed to deprivation, to hell, for not abandoning their conduct. Which two? One who, not living the celibate life, pretends to be one who lives the celibate life; and one who groundlessly accuses one who lives the celibate life perfectly & purely of uncelibate behavior. These are the two who are doomed to deprivation, to hell, for not abandoning their conduct."

He goes to hell,
the one who asserts
what didn't take place,
as does the one
who, having done,
says, 'I didn't.'

Both–low-acting people–
there become equal:
after death, in the world beyond.

An ochre robe tied 'round their necks,
many with evil qualities
–unrestrained, evil–
rearise, because of their evil acts,
in hell.

Better to eat an iron ball
–glowing, aflame–
than that, unprincipled &
unrestrained,
you should eat the alms of the country.[1]

Note

1. These verses = Dhp 306—308.

Itivuttaka 49

This was said by the Blessed One, said by the Arahant, so I have heard:
"Overcome by two viewpoints, monks, some human & divine beings adhere, other human & divine beings slip right past, while those with vision see.

"And how do some adhere? Human & divine beings enjoy becoming, delight in becoming, are satisfied with becoming. When the Dhamma is being taught for the sake of the cessation of becoming, their minds do not take to it, are not calmed by it, do not settle on it or become resolved on it. This is how some adhere.

"And how do some slip right past? Some, feeling horrified, humiliated, & disgusted with that very becoming, relish non-becoming: 'When this self, at the break-up of the body, after death, perishes & is destroyed, and does not exist after death, that is peaceful, that is exquisite, that is sufficiency!' This is how some slip right past.

"And how do those with vision see? There is the case where a monk sees what's come to be as what's come to be. Seeing what's come to be as what's come to be, he practices for disenchantment with what's come to be, dispassion toward what's come to be, cessation of what's come to be. This is how those with vision see."[1]

Those, having seen
what's come to be
as what's come to be,
and what's gone beyond
what's come to be,
are released in line
with what's come to be,
through the exhaustion of craving for becoming.

If they've comprehended
what's come to be,
and are free from the craving for becoming & non-,
with the non-becoming of what's come to be,
monks come
to no further becoming.

Note

1. This discourse illustrates, in a technical fashion, the function of appropriate attention explained in the note to §16. SN 12:15 presents the same point from a different perspective: "This world takes as its object a polarity, that of existence & non-existence. But when one sees the origination of the world [= the six senses and their objects] as it has come to be with right discernment, 'non-existence' with reference to the world does not occur to one. When one sees the cessation of the world as it has come to be with right discernment, 'existence' with reference to the world does not occur to one. By & large, this world is in bondage to attachments, clingings, & biases. But one such as this does not get involved with or cling to these attachments, clingings, fixations of awareness, biases, or obsessions; nor is he resolved on 'my self.' He has no uncertainty or doubt that mere stress, when arising, is arising; stress, when passing away, is passing away. In this, his knowledge is independent of others. It's to this extent, Kaccāna, that there is right view."

This was said by the Blessed One, said by the Arahant, so I have heard: "Monks, there are these three roots of what is unskillful. Which three? Greed as a root of what is unskillful, aversion as a root of what is unskillful, delusion as a root of what is unskillful. These are the three roots of what is unskillful."

Greed, aversion, delusion destroy the self-same person of evil mind from whom they are born, like the fruiting
of the bamboo.

Itivuttaka 51

This was said by the Blessed One, said by the Arahant, so I have heard: "Monks, there are these three properties. Which three? The property of form, the property of formlessness, the property of cessation.[1] These are the three properties."

Comprehending the property of form, not taking a stance in the formless, those released in cessation
are people who've left death behind.

Having touched with his body
the deathless
property free
from acquisitions,
having realized the relinquishing
of acquisitions,
effluent-free,
the Rightly
Self-awakened One teaches the state
with no sorrow,
no dust.

Note

1. The property of form corresponds to the experience of the form of the body as present in the first four levels of jhāna (see Glossary). The property of formlessness corresponds to the formless experiences based on the fourth level of jhāna: the dimension of the infinitude of space, the dimension of the infinitude of consciousness, the dimension of nothingness, and the dimension of neither perception nor non-perception. The property of cessation is the experience of the total cessation of stress.

Itivuttaka 52

This was said by the Blessed One, said by the Arahant, so I have heard: "Monks, there are these three feelings. Which three? A feeling of pleasure, a feeling of pain, a feeling of neither pleasure nor pain. These are the three feelings."

Centered,
alert,
mindful,
the Awakened One's disciple
discerns feelings,
how feelings come into play,
where they cease,
& the path to their ending.

With the ending of feelings, a monk
free from hunger
is totally unbound.

Itivuttaka 53

This was said by the Blessed One, said by the Arahant, so I have heard: "Monks, there are these three feelings. Which three? A feeling of pleasure, a feeling of pain, a feeling of neither pleasure nor pain. A feeling of pleasure should be seen as stressful. A feeling of pain should be seen as an arrow. A feeling of neither pleasure nor pain should be seen as inconstant. When a monk has seen a feeling of pleasure as stressful, a feeling of pain as an arrow, and a feeling of neither pleasure nor pain as inconstant, then he is called a monk who is noble, who has seen rightly, who has cut off craving, destroyed the fetters, and who–from the right breaking-through of conceit–has put an end to suffering & stress."

Whoever sees pleasure as stress,
sees pain as an arrow,
sees peaceful neither pleasure nor pain
    as inconstant:
he is a monk
who's seen rightly.
From that he is there released.
    A master of direct knowing,
        at peace,
    he is a sage
    gone beyond bonds.

Itivuttaka 54

This was said by the Blessed One, said by the Arahant, so I have heard: "Monks, there are these three searches. Which three? The search for sensuality, the search for becoming, the search for a holy life. These are the three searches."

Centered,
alert,
mindful,
the Awakened One's disciple
discerns searches,
how searches come into play,
where they cease,
& the path to their ending.

With the ending of searches, a monk
free from hunger
is totally unbound.

Itivuttaka 55

This was said by the Blessed One, said by the Arahant, so I have heard: "Monks, there are these three searches. Which three? The search for sensuality, the search for becoming, the search for a holy life. These are the three searches."

Sensuality-search, becoming-search, together with the holy-life search– i.e., grasping at 'such is the truth' based on an accumulation of viewpoints:
through the relinquishing of searches & the abolishing of viewpoints of one dispassionate to all passion,
        and released in the ending
                of craving,
through the ending of searches, the monk is without perplexity, free of longing.

Itivuttaka 56

This was said by the Blessed One, said by the Arahant, so I have heard: "Monks, there are these three effluents. Which three? The effluent of sensuality, the effluent of becoming, the effluent of ignorance. These are the three effluents."

Centered,
alert,
mindful,
the Awakened One's disciple
discerns effluents,
how effluents come into play,
where they cease,
& the path to their ending.

With the ending of effluents, a monk
free from hunger
is totally unbound.

Itivuttaka 57

This was said by the Blessed One, said by the Arahant, so I have heard: "Monks, there are these three effluents. Which three? The effluent of sensuality, the effluent of becoming, the effluent of ignorance. These are the three effluents."

His effluent of sensuality ended,
his ignorance
    faded away,
his effluent of becoming
    exhausted:
one totally released, acquisition-free,
    bears his last body,
having conquered Māra
    along with his mount.

Itivuttaka 58

This was said by the Blessed One, said by the Arahant, so I have heard: "Monks, there are these three cravings. Which three? Craving for sensuality, craving for becoming, craving for non-becoming. These are the three cravings."

Bound with the bondage of craving, their minds smitten
with becoming & non-,
they are bound with the bondage of Māra– people with no safety from bondage, beings going through the wandering-on,
headed for birth & death.

While those who've abandoned craving, free from the craving for becoming & non-,
reaching the ending of effluents, though in the world,
have gone beyond.

Itivuttaka 59

This was said by the Blessed One, said by the Arahant, so I have heard:
"Endowed with three qualities, monks, a monk has passed beyond Māra's domain and shines like the sun. Which three? There is the case where a monk is endowed with the aggregate of virtue of one beyond training [i.e., an Arahant], the aggregate of concentration of one beyond training, the aggregate of discernment of one beyond training. Endowed with these three qualities a monk has passed beyond Māra's domain and shines like the sun."

Virtue, concentration, discernment:
one in whom these are well-developed, passing beyond Māra's domain, shines
    like the sun.

Itivuttaka 60

This was said by the Blessed One, said by the Arahant, so I have heard: "Monks, there are these three grounds for meritorious activity. Which three? The ground for meritorious activity made of generosity, the ground for meritorious activity made of virtue, and the ground for meritorious activity made of development [meditation]. These are the three grounds for meritorious activity."

Train in acts of merit
that yield the foremost profit of bliss–
develop generosity,
    a life in tune,
    a mind of good will.
Developing these
three things
that bring about bliss,
    the wise reappear
    in a world of bliss
unalloyed.

Itivuttaka 61

This was said by the Blessed One, said by the Arahant, so I have heard: "Monks, there are these three eyes. Which three? The eye of flesh, the divine eye,[1] & the eye of discernment. These are the three eyes."

The eye of flesh,
the eye divine,
the eye of discernment
unsurpassed:
these three eyes were taught by the Superlative Person.
The arising of the eye of flesh is the path to the eye divine.
When knowledge arises,
the eye of discernment unsurpassed:
whoever gains this eye is–from all suffering & stress–
released.

Note

1. For a description of what is seen with the divine eye, see DN 2.

Itivuttaka 62

This was said by the Blessed One, said by the Arahant, so I have heard: "Monks, there are these three faculties. Which three? The faculty of 'I am about to know what is not yet finally known,' the faculty of final knowledge, the faculty of one who has finally known.[1] These are the three faculties."

For a learner in training
    along the straight path:
    first, the knowledge of ending;
    then, immediately,
        gnosis;
    then, from the ending
    of the fetter–becoming– there's the knowledge, the gnosis of one released who is Such:[2]
        'My release is unprovoked.'[3]

One consummate in these faculties, peaceful,
    delighting in the peaceful state,
        bears his last body,
    having conquered Māra
        along with his mount.

Notes

1. According to the Commentary, the first of these faculties corresponds to the first noble attainment, the path to stream-entry; the second, to the next six attainments, ranging from the fruition of stream-entry to the path to Arahantship; and the third, to the highest attainment, the fruition of Arahantship. The prose portion of this itivuttaka is repeated at AN 3:86, and §102.

2. Such (tādin): see the note to §44.

3. Akuppā. This term is sometimes translated as "unshakable," but it literally means, "unprovoked." The reference is apparently to the theory of dhātu, or properties underlying physical or psychological events in nature. The physical properties according to this theory are four: earth (solidity), liquid, heat, and wind (motion). Three of them–liquid, heat, & wind–are potentially active. When they are aggravated, agitated, or provoked–the Pali term here, pakuppati, is used also on the psychological level, where it means angered or upset–they act as the underlying cause for natural activity. When the provocation ends, the corresponding activity subsides.

Although §44 lists two nibbāna properties, these two properties are distinctive in that the experience of nibbāna is not caused by their provocation. Because true release is not caused by the provocation of anything–a fact that is known immediately after the experience itself–it is not subject to change.

Itivuttaka 63

This was said by the Blessed One, said by the Arahant, so I have heard: "Monks, there are these three times. Which three? Past time, future time, present time. These are the three times."

Perceiving in terms of signs, beings take a stand on signs.
Not fully comprehending signs, they come into the bonds of death.
But fully comprehending signs, one doesn't construe a signifier.
Touching liberation with the heart,
    the state of peace unsurpassed, consummate in terms of signs,
        peaceful,
        delighting in the peaceful state,
        judicious,
    an attainer-of-wisdom
        makes use of classifications but can't be classified.[1]

Note

1. At first glance, the verses here do not bear much relationship to the prose introduction. However, if they are viewed in the context of MN 2 (see the note to §16), their relationship becomes clear: the person who applies appropriate attention to the notion of past, present, and future time does not define him or herself in those terms, and so does not cling to any sense of self in those terms. Without clinging, one is liberated from birth and death.

Itivuttaka 64

This was said by the Blessed One, said by the Arahant, so I have heard: "Monks, there are these three kinds of misconduct. Which three? Bodily misconduct, verbal misconduct, mental misconduct.[1] These are the three kinds of misconduct."

Having engaged
in bodily misconduct,
acts of verbal misconduct,
misconduct of mind,
or whatever else is flawed,
not having done what is skillful,
having done much that is not,
at the break-up of the body,
the undiscerning one reappears in
hell.

Note

1. See the note to §30.

Itivuttaka 65

This was said by the Blessed One, said by the Arahant, so I have heard: "Monks, there are these three kinds of good conduct. Which three? Bodily good conduct, verbal good conduct, mental good conduct. These are the three kinds of good conduct."

Having abandoned
bodily misconduct,
acts of verbal misconduct,
misconduct of mind,
& whatever else is flawed,
not having done what's not skillful,
having done much that is,
at the break-up of the body,
the discerning one reappears
in heaven.

Itivuttaka 66

This was said by the Blessed One, said by the Arahant, so I have heard: "Monks, there are these three kinds of cleanliness. Which three? Bodily cleanliness, verbal cleanliness, mental cleanliness. These are the three kinds of cleanliness."

Clean in body,
clean in speech,
clean in awareness
–effluent-free–
one who is clean,
consummate in cleanliness, is said to have abandoned
the All.

Itivuttaka 67

This was said by the Blessed One, said by the Arahant, so I have heard: "Monks, there are these three forms of sagacity. Which three? Bodily sagacity, verbal sagacity, mental sagacity. These are the three forms of sagacity."

> A sage in body, a sage in speech, > a sage in mind, effluent-free:
> a sage consummate in sagacity > is said to be bathed of evil.

Itivuttaka 68

This was said by the Blessed One, said by the Arahant, so I have heard: "Monks, anyone whose passion is unabandoned, whose aversion is unabandoned, whose delusion is unabandoned is said to have gone over to Māra's camp, has come under Māra's power. The Evil One can do with that person as he likes. But anyone whose passion is abandoned, whose aversion is abandoned, whose delusion is abandoned is said not to have gone over to Māra's camp, has thrown off Māra's power. With that person, the Evil One cannot do as he likes."

Anyone
whose passion, aversion, & ignorance have faded away,
is said to be composed in mind,
    Brahma-become,
    awakened, Tathāgata,
    one for whom fear & hostility are past,
    one who's abandoned
        the All.

Itivuttaka 69

This was said by the Blessed One, said by the Arahant, so I have heard: "Monks, anyone–monk or nun–in whom passion is unabandoned, aversion is unabandoned, & delusion is unabandoned, is said not to have crossed the ocean with its waves, breakers, & whirlpools, its seizers & demons.[1] Anyone–monk or nun–in whom passion is abandoned, aversion is abandoned, & delusion is abandoned, is said to have crossed the ocean with its waves, breakers, & whirlpools, its seizers & demons. Having crossed over, having reached the far shore, he/she stands on high ground, a brahman."

One whose passion, aversion, & ignorance
    have faded away,
has crossed over this ocean
with its seizers,
        demons,
dangerous waves,
    so hard to cross.

Free from acquisitions
    –bonds surmounted,
    death abandoned–
he has abandoned stress with no further becoming.

Having gone to the goal
he is undefined,[2]
    has outwitted, I tell you, the King of Death.

Itivuttaka 70

This was said by the Blessed One, said by the Arahant, so I have heard: "Monks, I have seen beings who–endowed with bodily misconduct, verbal misconduct, & mental misconduct; who reviled noble ones, held wrong views and undertook actions under the influence of wrong views–at the break-up of the body, after death, have re-appeared in the plane of deprivation, the bad destination, the lower realms, in hell. It is not from having heard this from another contemplative or brahman that I tell you that I have seen beings who–endowed with bodily misconduct, verbal misconduct, & mental misconduct; who reviled noble ones, held wrong views and undertook actions under the influence of wrong views–at the break-up of the body, after death, have re-appeared in a plane of deprivation, a bad destination, a lower realm, hell. It is from having known it myself, seen it myself, realized it myself that I tell you that I have seen beings who–endowed with bodily misconduct, verbal misconduct, & mental misconduct; who reviled noble ones, held wrong views and undertook actions under the influence of wrong views–at the break-up of the body, after death, have re-appeared in a plane of deprivation, a bad destination, a lower realm, hell."

With mind wrongly directed, speaking wrong speech,
doing wrong deeds with the body:
    a person here
of next-to-nothing learning, a doer of evil
    here in this next-to-nothing life,
at the break-up of the body,
    undiscerning,
    reappears in hell.

Itivuttaka 71

This was said by the Blessed One, said by the Arahant, so I have heard: "Monks, I have seen beings who–endowed with bodily good conduct, verbal good conduct, & mental good conduct; who did not revile noble ones, who held right views and undertook actions under the influence of right views–at the break-up of the body, after death, have re-appeared in a good destination, a heavenly world. It's not from having heard this from another contemplative or brahman that I tell you that I have seen beings who–endowed with bodily good conduct, verbal good conduct, & mental good conduct; who did not revile noble ones, who held right views and undertook actions under the influence of right views–at the break-up of the body, after death, have re-appeared in a good destination, a heavenly world. It's from having known it myself, seen it myself, realized it myself that I tell you that I have seen beings who–endowed with bodily good conduct, verbal good conduct, & mental good conduct; who did not revile noble ones, who held right views and undertook actions under the influence of right views–at the break-up of the body, after death, have re-appeared in a good destination, a heavenly world."

With mind rightly directed, speaking right speech,
doing right deeds with the body:
    a person here
of much learning,
a doer of merit
    here in this next-to-nothing life,
at the break-up of the body,
    discerning,
    reappears in heaven.

Itivuttaka 72

This was said by the Blessed One, said by the Arahant, so I have heard: "Monks, there are these three properties for escape. Which three? This is the escape from sensuality: renunciation.[1] This is the escape from form: formlessness. And as for whatever has come into being, is fabricated & dependently co-arisen, the escape from that is cessation. These are the three properties for escape."

Knowing the escape from sensuality, & the overcoming of forms –ardent
always– touching the stilling
of all fabrications:
he is a monk
who's seen rightly.

From that he is there released.
A master of direct knowing,
at peace,
he is a sage
gone beyond bonds.

Note

1. Renunciation here means the first level of jhāna, which is attained when one is secluded from sensual passion and unskillful mental qualities. On formlessness and cessation, see the note to §51. See also AN 5:200.

Itivuttaka 73

This was said by the Blessed One, said by the Arahant, so I have heard: "Monks, formless phenomena are more peaceful than forms; cessation, more peaceful than formless phenomena."

Those beings headed to forms,
and those standing in the formless,
with no knowledge of cessation,
return to further becoming.
But, comprehending form,
not taking a stance in formless things,
those released in cessation
are people who've left death behind.

Having touched with his body
the deathless property free
from acquisitions,
having realized relinquishing
of acquisitions,
effluent-free,
the Rightly Self-awakened One teaches the state
with
no sorrow,
no dust.

Itivuttaka 74

This was said by the Blessed One, said by the Arahant, so I have heard: "Monks, there are these three types of sons & daughters existing in the world. Which three? One of heightened birth, one of similar birth, one of lowered birth.

"And how is a son or daughter of heightened birth? There is the case where a son or daughter's parents have not gone to the Buddha for refuge, have not gone to the Dhamma for refuge, have not gone to the Saṅgha for refuge. They do not abstain from taking life, from stealing, from sexual misconduct, from false speech, from fermented & distilled liquors that cause heedlessness. They are unprincipled & evil by nature. However, their son or daughter has gone to the Buddha for refuge, has gone to the Dhamma for refuge, has gone to the Saṅgha for refuge. He/she abstains from taking life, from stealing, from sexual misconduct, from false speech, from fermented & distilled liquors that cause heedlessness. He/she is principled & admirable by nature. This is called a son or daughter of heightened birth.

"And how is a son or daughter of similar birth? There is the case where a son or daughter's parents have gone to the Buddha for refuge, have gone to the Dhamma for refuge, have gone to the Saṅgha for refuge. They abstain from taking life, from stealing, from sexual misconduct, from false speech, from fermented & distilled liquors that cause heedlessness. They are principled & admirable by nature. Their son or daughter has also gone to the Buddha for refuge, has gone to the Dhamma for refuge, has gone to the Saṅgha for refuge. He/she abstains from taking life, from stealing, from sexual misconduct, from false speech, from fermented & distilled liquors that cause heedlessness. He/she is principled & admirable by nature. This is called a son or daughter of similar birth.

"And how is a son or daughter of lowered birth? There is the case where a son or daughter's parents have gone to the Buddha for refuge, have gone to the Dhamma for refuge, have gone to the Saṅgha for refuge. They abstain from taking life, from stealing, from sexual misconduct, from false speech, from fermented & distilled liquors that cause heedlessness. They are principled & admirable by nature. However, their son or daughter has not gone to the Buddha for refuge, has not gone to the Dhamma for refuge, has not gone to the Saṅgha for refuge. He/she does not abstain from taking life, from stealing, from sexual misconduct, from false speech, from fermented & distilled liquors that cause heedlessness. He/she is unprincipled & evil by nature. This is called a son or daughter of lowered birth."

The wise hope for a child of heightened or similar birth, not for one of lowered birth,
    a destroyer of the family.
These children in the world,
    lay followers
–consummate in virtue, conviction; generous, free from stinginess– shine forth in any gathering
like the moon
when freed from a cloud.

Itivuttaka 75

This was said by the Blessed One, said by the Arahant, so I have heard: "Monks, these three types of persons can be found existing in the world. Which three? One like a cloud without rain, one who rains locally, and one who rains everywhere.

"And how is a person like a cloud without rain? There is the case where a person is not a giver of food, drink, clothing, vehicles, garlands, scents, ointments, beds, dwellings, or lights to anyone at all: to contemplatives or brahmans, to any of the miserable, the homeless, or beggars. This is how a person is like a cloud without rain.

"And how is a person one who rains locally? There is the case where a person is a giver of food, drink, clothing, vehicles, garlands, scents, ointments, beds, dwellings, & lights to some contemplatives & brahmans, to some of the miserable, the homeless, & beggars, but not to others. This is how a person is one who rains locally.

"And how is a person one who rains everywhere? There is the case where a person gives food, drink, clothing, vehicles, garlands, scents, ointments, beds, dwellings, & lights to all contemplatives & brahmans, to all of the miserable, the homeless, & beggars. This is how a person is one who rains everywhere.

"These are the three types of persons who can be found existing in the world."

Not to contemplatives, to brahmans,
to the miserable,
nor to the homeless
does he share what he's gained:
    food,
    drinks,

nourishment.
He, that lowest of people,
is called a cloud with no rain.

To some he doesn't give,
to others he does:
the intelligent call him
one who rains locally.

A person responsive to requests,
sympathetic to all beings,
delighting in distributing alms:
"Give to them!
Give!"
he says.
As a cloud–resounding, thundering–rains, filling with water, drenching the plateaus & gullies:
a person like this is like that.
Having rightly amassed wealth attained through initiative, he satisfies rightly with food & drink those fallen into the homeless state.

Itivuttaka 76

This was said by the Blessed One, said by the Arahant, so I have heard:
"Aspiring to these three forms of bliss, monks, a wise person should guard his virtue. Which three? [Thinking,] 'May praise come to me,' a wise person should guard his virtue. [Thinking,] 'May wealth come to me,' a wise person should guard his virtue. [Thinking,] 'At the break-up of the body, after death, may I reappear in a good destination, a heavenly world,' a wise person should guard his virtue. Aspiring to these three forms of bliss, a wise person should guard his virtue."

Intelligent,
you should guard your virtue, aspiring to three forms of bliss:
praise;
the obtaining of wealth;
and, after death, rejoicing
in heaven.

Even if you do no evil
but seek out one who does, you're suspected of evil.
Your bad reputation
grows.
The sort of person you make a friend,
the sort you seek out,
that's the sort you yourself become– for your living together is of that sort.

The one associated with,
the one who associates,
the one who's touched,

the one who touches another –like an arrow smeared with poison– contaminates the quiver.
So, fearing contamination, the enlightened should not be comrades with evil people.

A man who wraps rotting fish in a blade of kusa grass makes the grass smelly:
so it is
if you seek out fools.
But a man who wraps powdered incense in the leaf of a tree
makes the leaf fragrant:
so it is
if you seek out
the enlightened.

So,
knowing your own outcome
as like the leaf-wrapper's, you shouldn't seek out
those who aren't good.
The wise would associate with those who are.
Those who aren't good
lead you to hell.
The good help you reach a good destination.

Itivuttaka 77

This was said by the Blessed One, said by the Arahant, so I have heard: "Monks, this body falls apart; consciousness is subject to fading; all acquisitions are inconstant, stressful, subject to change."

Knowing the body as falling apart, & consciousness as dissolving away, seeing the danger in acquisitions, you've gone beyond
birth & death.
Having reached the foremost peace,
you bide your time,
composed.

Itivuttaka 78

This was said by the Blessed One, said by the Arahant, so I have heard: "Monks, it's in accordance with their properties that beings come together & associate with one another. Beings of low dispositions come together & associate with beings of low dispositions. Beings of admirable dispositions come together & associate with beings of admirable dispositions. In the past, it was in accordance with their properties that beings came together & associated with one another.… In the future, it will be in accordance with their properties that beings will come together & associate with one another.… And now at present, it's in accordance with their properties that beings come together & associate with one another. Beings of low dispositions come together & associate with beings of low dispositions. Beings of admirable dispositions come together & associate with beings of admirable dispositions."

The underbrush born of association
is cut away
by non-association.
Just as one riding
a small wooden plank would sink
in the great sea,
so does even one of right living sink,
associating with the lazy.

So avoid the lazy,
those with low persistence.
Live with the noble ones– secluded, resolute, absorbed in jhāna, their persistence constantly aroused

: the wise.

Itivuttaka 79

This was said by the Blessed One, said by the Arahant, so I have heard: "Monks, these three things lead to the falling away of a monk in training. Which three? There is the case where a monk in training enjoys activity,[1] delights in activity, is intent on his enjoyment of activity. He enjoys chatter, delights in chatter, is intent on his enjoyment of chatter. He enjoys sleep, delights in sleep, is intent on his enjoyment of sleep. These are the three things that lead to the falling away of a monk in training.

"These three things lead to the non-falling away of a monk in training. Which three? There is the case where a monk in training doesn't enjoy activity, doesn't delight in activity, isn't intent on his enjoyment of activity. He doesn't enjoy chatter, doesn't delight in chatter, isn't intent on his enjoyment of chatter. He doesn't enjoy sleep, doesn't delight in sleep, isn't intent on his enjoyment of sleep. These are the three things that lead to the non-falling away of a monk in training."

Enjoying activity,
delighting in chatter,
enjoying sleep, & restless:
    he's incapable
    –a monk like this–
    of touching superlative
self-awakening.
So he should be a man of few duties,
of little sloth,
not restless.
    He's capable
    –a monk like this–
    of touching superlative

self-awakening.

Note

1. Activity = work of various sorts, such as construction work, robe-making, etc. See SN 7:17 and Thig 13:2.

Itivuttaka 80

This was said by the Blessed One, said by the Arahant, so I have heard: "Monks, there are these three kinds of unskillful thinking. Which three? Thinking concerned with not wanting to be despised;[1] thinking concerned with gains, offerings, & tribute; thinking concerned with an empathy for others.[2] There are three kinds of unskillful thinking."

Fettered
to not wanting to be despised;
to gains, offerings, respect;
to delight in companions:
you're far from the ending of fetters.
But whoever here,
having abandoned
sons,
cattle,
marriage,
intimates:
he's capable
–a monk like this–
of touching superlative
self-awakening.

Notes

1. See AN 3:102.

2. According to the Commentary, this refers to a monk's tendency to be overly intimate with lay people, overly susceptible to the rises and falls in their fortunes, "happy when they are happy, sad when they are sad, busying himself with their affairs."

Itivuttaka 81

This was said by the Blessed One, said by the Arahant, so I have heard: "Monks, I have seen beings conquered by receiving offerings–their minds overwhelmed–at the break-up of the body, after death, reappearing in a plane of deprivation, a bad destination, a lower realm, hell. I have seen beings conquered by not receiving offerings–their minds overwhelmed–at the break-up of the body, after death, reappearing in a plane of deprivation, a bad destination, a lower realm, hell. I have seen beings conquered both by receiving offerings & by not receiving offerings–their minds overwhelmed–at the break-up of the body, after death, reappearing in a plane of deprivation, a bad destination, a lower realm, hell.

"It's not through having heard it from another contemplative or brahman that I say, 'I have seen beings conquered by receiving offerings–their minds overwhelmed–at the break-up of the body, after death, reappearing in a plane of deprivation, a bad destination, a lower realm, hell. I have seen beings conquered by not receiving offerings–their minds overwhelmed–at the break-up of the body, after death, reappearing in a plane of deprivation, a bad destination, a lower realm, hell. I have seen beings conquered both by receiving offerings & by not receiving offerings–their minds overwhelmed–at the break-up of the body, after death, reappearing in a plane of deprivation, a bad destination, a lower realm, hell.'

"Instead, it's from having known it myself, seen it myself, observed it myself that I say, 'I have seen beings conquered by receiving offerings–their minds overwhelmed–at the break-up of the body, after death, reappearing in a plane of deprivation, a bad destination, a lower realm, hell. I have seen beings conquered by not receiving offerings–their minds overwhelmed–at the break-up of the body, after death, reappearing in a plane of deprivation, a bad destination, a lower realm, hell. I have seen beings conquered both by receiving offerings & by not receiving offerings–their minds overwhelmed–at the break-up of the body, after death, reappearing in a plane of deprivation, a bad destination, a lower realm, hell.'"

Both when receiving offerings & not,
his concentration
    doesn't waver;
he remains
heedful:
he–continually absorbed in jhāna, subtle in view & clear-seeing,
enjoying the ending of clinging– is called a man of integrity.

Itivuttaka 82

This was said by the Blessed One, said by the Arahant, so I have heard: "Monks, these three divine sounds sound forth among the devas on appropriate occasions. Which three? When a disciple of the noble ones, shaving off his hair & beard, clothing himself in the ochre robe, makes up his mind to go forth from the home life into homelessness, on that occasion the divine sound sounds forth among the devas: 'This disciple of the noble ones has made up his mind to do battle with Māra.' This is the first divine sound that sounds forth among the devas on appropriate occasions.

"When a disciple of the noble ones lives devoted to developing the seven [sets of] qualities that are wings to awakening,[1] on that occasion the divine sound sounds forth among the devas: 'This disciple of the noble ones is doing battle with Māra.' This is the second divine sound that sounds forth among the devas on appropriate occasions.

"When a disciple of the noble ones, through the ending of effluents, enters & remains in the effluent-free awareness-release & discernment-release, directly knowing & realizing it for himself right in the here-&-now, on that occasion the divine sound sounds forth among the devas: 'This disciple of the noble ones, having won the battle, now rules victorious at the head of the battle.' This is the third divine sound that sounds forth among the devas on appropriate occasions.

"These are the three divine sounds that sound forth among the devas on appropriate occasions."

Seeing he's won the battle
–the disciple of the Rightly
Self-awakened One–
even the devas pay homage to this great one, thoroughly mature.
"Homage to you, O thoroughbred man–

you who have won the hard victory, defeating the army of Death, unhindered in emancipation."
Thus they pay homage, the devas, to one who has reached the heart's goal, for they see in him no means[2] that would bring him under Death's sway.

Notes

1. The wings to awakening are the four establishings of mindfulness, the four right exertions, the four bases for power, the five faculties, the five strengths, the seven factors for awakening, and the noble eightfold path.

2. Reading na passanti with the Sri Lankan edition. The Thai edition reads, namassanti, "they pay homage," which makes no sense.

Itivuttaka 83

This was said by the Blessed One, said by the Arahant, so I have heard:

"Monks, when a deva is about to pass away from the company of devas, five omens appear: his garlands wither, his clothes get soiled, sweat comes out of his armpits, a dullness descends on his body, he no longer delights in his own deva-seat. The devas, knowing from this that 'This deva-son is about to pass away,' encourage him with three sayings: 'Go from here, honorable sir, to a good destination. Having gone to a good destination, gain the gain that is good to gain. Having gained the gain that is good to gain, become well-established.'"

When this was said, a certain monk said to the Blessed One, "What, lord, is the devas' reckoning of going to a good destination? What is their reckoning of the gain that is good to gain? What is their reckoning of becoming well-established?"

"The human state, monks,[1] is the devas' reckoning of going to a good destination. Having become a human being, acquiring conviction in the Dhamma-&-Vinaya taught by the Tathāgata: this is the devas' reckoning of the gain that is good to gain. When that conviction is settled within one– rooted, established, & strong, not to be destroyed by any brahman or contemplative; deva, Māra, or Brahma; or anyone else in the world: this is the devas' reckoning of becoming well-established."

> When a deva passes away > from the company of devas > through his life-span's ending, > three sounds sound forth
> –the devas' encouragement.
>
> 'Go from here,
> honorable sir,

to a good destination,
to companionship
with human beings.
On becoming a human being,
acquire a conviction
unsurpassed
        in True Dhamma.
That conviction of yours in True Dhamma, well-taught, should be settled,
            rooted,
            established,
–undestroyed
as long as you live.
Having abandoned
        bodily misconduct,
        verbal misconduct,
        mental misconduct,
and whatever else is flawed;
having done with the body what's skillful,
and much that is skillful with speech, having done what's skillful with a heart without limit, with no acquisitions,
then–having made much of the merit that's a ground for spontaneously arising [in heaven] through giving– establish other mortals in True Dhamma &
    the holy life.'

With this sympathy, the devas– when they know a deva is passing away– encourage him:
                'Come back, deva,

again & again.'

Note

1. Reading bhikkhave with the Thai edition. The Burmese and Sri Lankan editions read bhikkhu, "monk."

Itivuttaka 84

This was said by the Blessed One, said by the Arahant, so I have heard: "Monks, these three persons, appearing in the world, appear for the benefit of many, the happiness of many, in sympathy for the world–for the welfare, the benefit, the happiness of beings human & divine. Which three?

"There is the case where a Tathāgata appears in the world, worthy & rightly self-awakened, consummate in clear knowing & conduct, well-gone, an expert with regard to the cosmos, unsurpassed trainer of tamable people, teacher of beings human & divine, awakened, blessed. He teaches the Dhamma admirable in its beginning, admirable in its middle, admirable in its end. He proclaims the holy life both in its particulars & in its essence, entirely perfect, surpassingly pure. This is the first person who, appearing in the world, appears for the benefit of many, the happiness of many, in sympathy for the world–for the welfare, the benefit, the happiness of beings human & divine.

"Furthermore, there is the disciple of that Teacher who is a worthy one, his effluents ended, who has reached fulfillment, done the task, laid down the burden, attained the true goal, totally destroyed the fetter of becoming, and who is released through right gnosis. He teaches the Dhamma admirable in its beginning, admirable in its middle, admirable in its end. He proclaims the holy life both in its particulars & in its essence, entirely perfect, surpassingly pure. This is the second person who, appearing in the world, appears for the benefit of many, the happiness of many, in sympathy for the world–for the welfare, the benefit, the happiness of beings human & divine.

"Furthermore, there is the disciple of that Teacher who is one who follows the practice for one in training,[1] erudite, having entered into [good] habits & practices. He, too, teaches the Dhamma admirable in its beginning, admirable in its middle, admirable in its end. He proclaims the holy life both in its particulars & in its essence, entirely perfect, surpassingly pure. This is the third person who, appearing in the world, appears for the benefit of many, the happiness of many, in sympathy for the world–for the welfare, the benefit, the happiness of beings human & divine.

"These are the three persons who, appearing in the world, appear for the benefit of many, the happiness of many, in sympathy for the world–for the welfare, the benefit, the happiness of beings human & divine."

The Teacher,
Great Seer,
is first in the world;
following him, the disciple with mind composed;
and then the erudite one who follows the practice for one in training, having entered into good habits, practices.

These three, chief among beings divine & human,
giving light, proclaiming the Dhamma, throw open the door to the Deathless, release many from bondage.
Those who follow the path, well-taught by the Caravan Leader
unsurpassed,
will put an end to stress
right here–
those heeding the message
of the One Well-Gone.

Note

1. Sekkho pāṭipado. This phrase also appears in MN 53, whose commentary treats it, not as two words, but as a compound meaning "one who follows the sekha-paṭipadā": in other words, a person who has attained at least the first level of awakening, stream-entry, but has not yet become an Arahant.

Itivuttaka 85

This was said by the Blessed One, said by the Arahant, so I have heard:
"Remain focused, monks, on foulness in the body. Have mindfulness of in-&-out breathing well-established to the fore within you. Remain focused on the inconstancy of all fabrications. For one who remains focused on the foulness of the body, the obsession with passion for the property of beauty is abandoned. For one who has mindfulness of in-&-out breathing well-established to the fore within oneself, annoying external thoughts & inclinations don't exist. For one who remains focused on the inconstancy of all fabrications, ignorance is abandoned, clear knowing arises."

Focusing on foulness
in the body,
mindful
of in-&-out breathing, seeing
the pacification of all fabrications –ardent
always:
he is a monk
who's seen rightly.

From that he is there released.
A master of direct knowing,
at peace,
he is a sage
gone beyond bonds.

Itivuttaka 86

This was said by the Blessed One, said by the Arahant, so I have heard: "Monks, with reference to a monk who practices the Dhamma in accordance with the Dhamma, it is this way of according with the Dhamma that he should be described as practicing the Dhamma in accordance with the Dhamma. When speaking, he speaks Dhamma and not non-Dhamma. When thinking, he thinks about Dhamma and not about non-Dhamma. Avoiding both these things, he stays equanimous, mindful, alert."

Dhamma his dwelling,
Dhamma his delight,
a monk pondering Dhamma,
    calling Dhamma to mind,
doesn't fall away
from true Dhamma.[1]

Whether
        walking,
        standing,
        sitting, or lying down
–his mind inwardly restrained– he arrives right at peace.

Itivuttaka 87

This was said by the Blessed One, said by the Arahant, so I have heard: "Monks, there are these three kinds of unskillful thinking that produce blindness, produce lack of vision, produce lack of knowledge, lead to the cessation of discernment, side with vexation, and are not conducive to Unbinding. Which three? Thinking imbued with sensuality.… Thinking imbued with ill-will.… Thinking imbued with harmfulness produces blindness, produces lack of vision, produces lack of knowledge, leads to the cessation of discernment, sides with vexation, and is not conducive to Unbinding. These are the three kinds of unskillful thinking that produce blindness, produce lack of vision, produce lack of knowledge, lead to the cessation of discernment, side with vexation, and are not conducive to Unbinding.

"There are these three kinds of skillful thinking that produce non-blindness, produce vision, produce knowledge, foster discernment, side with non-vexation, and are conducive to Unbinding. Which three? Thinking imbued with renunciation.… Thinking imbued with non-ill-will.… Thinking imbued with harmlessness produces non-blindness, produces vision, produces knowledge, fosters discernment, sides with non-vexation, and is conducive to Unbinding. These are the three kinds of skillful thinking that produce non-blindness, produce vision, produce knowledge, foster discernment, side with non-vexation, and are conducive to Unbinding."

Three skillful thoughts should be thought,
three unskillful thoughts rejected.
Whoever stills thoughts & evaluations –as rain would, a cloud of dust– through an awareness with thinking stilled, attains right here

the state
of peace.

Itivuttaka 88

This was said by the Blessed One, said by the Arahant, so I have heard: "Monks, there are these three inside stains, inside enemies, inside foes, inside murderers, inside adversaries. Which three? Greed is an inside stain, inside enemy, inside foe, inside murderer, inside adversary. Aversion is an inside stain.… Delusion is an inside stain, inside enemy, inside foe, inside murderer, inside adversary. These are the three inside stains, inside enemies, inside foes, inside murderers, inside adversaries."

Greed causes harm.
Greed provokes the mind.
People don't realize it
as a danger born from within.
A person, when greedy,
doesn't know his own welfare;
    when greedy,
doesn't see Dhamma.
Overcome with greed,
he's in the dark, blind.
But when one, abandoning greed, feels no greed
for what would merit greed, greed gets shed from him– like a drop of water off a lotus leaf.

Aversion causes harm.
Aversion provokes the mind.
People don't realize it
as a danger born from within.
A person, when aversive,
doesn't know his own welfare;

when aversive,
doesn't see Dhamma.
Overcome with aversion
he's in the dark, blind.
But when one, abandoning aversion, feels no aversion
for what would merit aversion, aversion drops away from him– like a palm leaf from its stem.

Delusion causes harm.
Delusion provokes the mind.
People don't realize it
as a danger born from within.
A person, when deluded,
doesn't know his own welfare;
when deluded,
doesn't see Dhamma.
Overcome with delusion
he's in the dark, blind.
But when one, abandoning delusion, feels no delusion
for what would merit delusion, he disperses all delusion–
as the rising of the sun, the dark.

Itivuttaka 89

This was said by the Blessed One, said by the Arahant, so I have heard: "Monks, conquered by three forms of false Dhamma–his mind overwhelmed–Devadatta[1] is incurably doomed to deprivation, to hell, for an eon. Which three? Conquered by evil desires–his mind overwhelmed–Devadatta is incurably doomed to deprivation, to hell, for the duration of an eon. Conquered by friendship with evil people–his mind overwhelmed–Devadatta is incurably doomed to deprivation, to hell, for the duration of an eon. And, there being something further to be done, he nevertheless stopped halfway with a lower modicum of distinctive attainment. Conquered by these three forms of false Dhamma–his mind overwhelmed–Devadatta is incurably doomed to deprivation, to hell, for an eon."

May no one in the world ever be reborn
with evil desire.
    Know that through that evil desire,
his destination's that of all who have evil desires.

I've heard how Devadatta, –regarded as wise, composed, incandescent with honor– in the thrall of heedlessness assaulted the Tathāgata and fell to the four-gated, fearful place:
    Avīci, unmitigated hell.

Whoever plots against one free of corruption

who's done no evil deed:
that evil touches him himself,
corrupted in mind,
disrespectful.

Whoever might think of polluting the ocean
with a pot of poison,
couldn't succeed,
for the mass of water is great.
So it is
when anyone attacks with abuse
the Tathāgata
–rightly-gone,
of peaceful mind–
for abuse doesn't grow on him.
A wise person should make friends, should associate,
with a person like him– whose path a monk can pursue and reach the ending
of suffering & stress.

Note

1. Devadatta, one of the Buddha's cousins, plotted to take over the Saṅgha, and ended up causing a schism. His story is told in Cv VII. See also §18. His "lower modicum of distinctive attainment" was his mastery of psychic powers.

Itivuttaka 90

This was said by the Blessed One, said by the Arahant, so I have heard: "Monks, there are these three supreme objects of confidence. Which three?

"Among whatever beings there may be–footless, two-footed, four-footed, many footed; with form or formless; percipient, non-percipient, neither percipient nor non-percipient–the Tathāgata, worthy & rightly self-awakened, is considered supreme. Those who have confidence in the Awakened One have confidence in what is supreme; and for those with confidence in the supreme, supreme is the result.

"Among whatever dhammas there may be, fabricated or unfabricated, dispassion–the subduing of intoxication, the elimination of thirst, the uprooting of attachment, the breaking of the round, the destruction of craving, dispassion, cessation, the realization of Unbinding–is considered supreme. Those who have confidence in the dhamma of dispassion have confidence in what is supreme; and for those with confidence in the supreme, supreme is the result.

"Among whatever fabricated qualities there may be, the noble eightfold path–right view, right resolve, right speech, right action, right livelihood, right effort, right mindfulness, right concentration–is considered supreme. Those who have confidence in the dhamma of the noble path have confidence in what is supreme; and for those with confidence in the supreme, supreme is the result.

"Among whatever communities or groups there may be, the Saṅgha of the Tathāgata's disciples is considered supreme–i.e., the four [groups of noble disciples] when taken as pairs, the eight when taken as persons.[1] Those who have confidence in the Saṅgha have confidence in what is supreme; and for those with confidence in the supreme, supreme will be the result.

"These, monks, are the three supreme objects of confidence."

With
confidence,
realizing the supreme Dhamma to be supreme;
confidence in the supreme Buddha,
unsurpassed
in deserving offerings;
confidence in the supreme Dhamma,
the bliss of stilling, dispassion;
confidence in the supreme Saṅgha,
unsurpassed
as a field of merit;
having given gifts to the supreme,
one develops supreme merit, supreme long life & beauty,
status, honor,
bliss, & strength.

Having given to the supreme,
the wise person, centered in supreme Dhamma,
whether becoming a divine or human being,
rejoices,
having attained the supreme.

Note

1. The four groups of noble disciples when taken as pairs are those who have attained (1) the path to stream-entry and the fruition of stream-entry; (2) the path to once-returning and the fruition of once-returning; (3) the path to non-returning and the fruition of non-returning; and (4) the path to Arahantship and the fruition of Arahantship. Taking each attainment singly gives eight "individuals."

This itivuttaka is almost identical with AN 4:34.

Itivuttaka 91

This was said by the Blessed One, said by the Arahant, so I have heard: "Monks, this is a lowly means of livelihood, alms gathering. It's a form of abuse in the world [to say], 'You go around as an alms gatherer with a bowl in your hand!' Yet reasonable young men of good families have taken it up for a compelling reason. They have not been forced into it by kings or robbers, nor through debt, through fear, nor through the loss of their livelihood, but through the thought: 'We are beset by birth, aging, & death, by sorrows, lamentations, pains, distresses, & despairs, beset by stress, overcome with stress. O, that the end of this entire mass of suffering & stress might be known!' But this young man of good family, having gone forth in this way, may be greedy for sensual pleasures, strong in his passions, malevolent in mind, corrupt in his resolves, his mindfulness muddled, unalert, uncentered, his mind scattered, & his faculties uncontrolled. Just as a firebrand from a funeral pyre–burning at both ends, covered with excrement in the middle–is used as fuel neither in a village nor in the wilderness: I tell you that this is a simile for this person. He has missed out on the householder's enjoyments and does not fulfill the purpose of the contemplative life."

He's missed out on the householder's enjoyment & the purpose of the contemplative life –unfortunate man!
Ruining it, he throws it away, perishes
like a firebrand used at a funeral.
Better to eat an iron ball
–glowing, aflame–
than that, unprincipled &
unrestrained,

he should eat the alms of the country.[1]

Note

1. This last verse = Dhp 308.

Itivuttaka 92

This was said by the Blessed One, said by the Arahant, so I have heard: "Monks, even if a monk, taking hold of my outer robe, were to follow right behind me, placing his feet in my footsteps, yet if he were to be greedy for sensuality, strong in his passions, malevolent in mind, corrupt in his resolves, his mindfulness muddled, unalert, uncentered, his mind scattered, & his faculties uncontrolled, then he would be far from me, and I from him. Why is that? Because he does not see the Dhamma. Not seeing the Dhamma, he does not see me.

"But even if a monk were to live one hundred leagues away, yet if he were to have no greed for sensuality, were not strong in his passions, not malevolent in mind, uncorrupt in his resolves, his mindfulness established, alert, centered, his mind at singleness, & his faculties well-restrained, then he would be near to me, and I to him. Why is that? Because he sees the Dhamma. Seeing the Dhamma, he sees me."

Though following right behind, ambitious, annoyed:
see how far he is!–
the perturbed
    from the unperturbed, the bound
    from the Unbound,
the greedy one
    from the one with no greed.

But the wise person who, through direct knowledge of Dhamma, gnosis of Dhamma,
grows still & unperturbed
like a lake unruffled by wind:

see how close he is!–
the unperturbed to the unperturbed, the Unbound to the Unbound, the greedless one
to the one with no greed.

Itivuttaka 93

This was said by the Blessed One, said by the Arahant, so I have heard: "Monks, there are these three fires. Which three? The fire of passion, the fire of aversion, the fire of delusion. These are the three fires."

The fire of passion burns in a mortal delighting in,
smitten with
sensual desires;
the fire of aversion, in a malevolent person taking life;
the fire of delusion, in a bewildered person ignorant
of the noble teaching.
Not understanding these fires, people –fond of self-identity– unreleased from Māra's shackles, swell the ranks of hell,
the wombs of common animals, demons,
the realm of the hungry ghosts.

While those who, day & night, are devoted to the message
of the rightly self-awakened, put out the fire of passion, constantly perceiving the foul.
They, superlative people, put out the fire of aversion with good will,
and the fire of delusion with the discernment leading

to penetration.
They, the masterful, untiring by night & day, having put out [the fires],
having, without remainder,
comprehended stress,
are, without remainder,
totally unbound.
They, the wise, with an attainer-of-wisdom's
noble vision,
right gnosis,
directly knowing
the ending of birth,
come to no further becoming.

Itivuttaka 94

This was said by the Blessed One, said by the Arahant, so I have heard: "Monks, a monk should investigate in such a way that–his consciousness neither externally scattered & diffused, nor internally positioned–he is, from lack of clinging/sustenance, unagitated, and there is no coming into being of the origination of future birth, aging, death, or stress."[1]

For a monk who has abandoned seven attachments and cut the guide:[2]

the wandering-on in birth is finished;
there is, for him,
no further becoming.

Notes

1. In MN 138, Ven. MahāKaccāna offers the following explanation of this cryptic statement:

"And how is consciousness said not to be externally scattered & diffused? There is the case where, having seen a form with the eye, consciousness does not follow the drift of the theme of the form, is not tied to… chained to… fettered, or joined to the attraction of the theme of the form. Consciousness is said not to be externally scattered & diffused. [Similarly with the other senses.] …

"And how is the mind said not to be internally positioned? There is the case where a monk, quite secluded from sensuality, secluded from unskillful qualities, enters & remains in the first jhāna: rapture & pleasure born of seclusion, accompanied by directed thought & evaluation. His consciousness does not follow the drift of the rapture & pleasure born of seclusion, is not tied to… chained to… fettered, or joined to the attraction of the rapture & pleasure born of seclusion. [Similarly with the second, third, and fourth jhānas.] The mind is said not to be internally positioned."

"And how is non-agitation caused by lack of clinging/sustenance? There is the case where an instructed disciple of the noble ones–who has regard for noble ones, is well-versed & disciplined in their Dhamma; who has regard for people of integrity, is well-versed & disciplined in their Dhamma–doesn't assume form to be the self, or the self as possessing form, or form as in the self, or the self as in form. His form changes & is unstable, but his consciousness doesn't–because of the change & instability of form–alter in accordance with the change in form. His mind is not consumed with any agitation born from an alteration in accordance with the change in form or coming from the co-arising of [unskillful mental] qualities. And because his awareness is not consumed, he feels neither fearful, threatened, nor solicitous. [Similarly with the aggregates of feeling, perception, fabrications, and consciousness.] "This, friends, is how non-agitation is caused by lack of clinging/sustenance."

2. The "seven attachments" are passion, aversion, delusion, views, conceit, defilement, & misconduct. The "guide" is craving, which leads to becoming.

Itivuttaka 95

This was said by the Blessed One, said by the Arahant, so I have heard: "Monks, there are these three ways of obtaining sensual pleasures. Which three? Those whose sensual pleasures are already provided, those who delight in creating, those with control over what is created by others.[1] These are the three ways of obtaining sensual pleasures."

Devas whose pleasures are already provided, those with control,
    those who delight in creation, and any others enjoying sensual pleasures in this state here
or anywhere else,
    don't go beyond
    the wandering-on.
Knowing this drawback
in sensual pleasures, the wise should abandon all sensual desires, whether human or divine.
Having cut the flow of greed for lovely, alluring forms
so hard to transcend,
having, without remainder,
    comprehended stress,
they are, without remainder,
    totally unbound.
They, the wise, with an attainer-of-wisdom's
        noble vision,
        right gnosis,
directly knowing the ending of birth,

come to no further becoming.

Note

1. As the verse makes clear, these three categories denote three levels of devas in the heavens of sensual pleasure. "Those in control" are at the highest of these levels.

Itivuttaka 96

This was said by the Blessed One, said by the Arahant, so I have heard: "Tied by the yoke of sensuality & the yoke of becoming, monks, one is a returner, returning to this state. Untied from the yoke of sensuality but tied by the yoke of becoming, one is a non-returner, not returning to this state. Untied from [both] the yoke of sensuality & from the yoke of becoming, one is an Arahant whose effluents are ended."

Tied by both the yoke of sensuality & the yoke of becoming, beings go to the wandering-on leading to birth & death.
Those who've abandoned the sensual without reaching the ending of effluents, are tied by the yoke of becoming,
are said to be Non-returners.
While those who've cut off doubt have no more conceit or further becoming.
They who have reached
    the ending of effluents,
while in the world
    have gone
        beyond.

Itivuttaka 97

This was said by the Blessed One, said by the Arahant, so I have heard: "Monks, a monk who has admirable virtue, admirable qualities, & admirable discernment is called, in this Dhamma-&-Vinaya, one who is complete, fulfilled, a superlative person.

"And how is a monk a person with admirable virtue? There is the case where a monk is virtuous. He dwells restrained in accordance with the Pāṭimokkha, consummate in his behavior & sphere of activity. He trains himself, having undertaken the training rules, seeing danger in the slightest faults. In this way a monk is a person with admirable virtue. Thus he is of admirable virtue.

"And how is a monk a person with admirable qualities? There is the case where a monk lives devoted to developing the seven [sets of] qualities that are wings to awakening.[1] In this way a monk is a person with admirable qualities. Thus he is of admirable virtue & admirable qualities.

"And how is a monk a person with admirable discernment? There is the case where a monk–with the ending of effluents–remains in the effluent-free awareness-release & discernment-release, directly knowing & realizing it for himself right in the here-&-now. In this way a monk is a person with admirable discernment. Thus he is of admirable virtue, admirable qualities, admirable discernment. In this Dhamma-&-Vinaya he is called one who is complete, fulfilled, a superlative person."

> Devoid of wrong-doing > in thought, word, or deed, > he's called a person of admirable virtue:
> the monk conscientious.
> Well-developed in the qualities > that go to the attainment of self-awakening, > he's called a person of admirable qualities:

the monk unassuming.
Discerning right here for himself,
in himself,
the ending of stress
he's called a person of admirable discernment:
the monk with no effluent.
Consummate in these things,
untroubled, with doubt cut away, unattached in all the world, he's said to have abandoned
the All.

Itivuttaka 98

This was said by the Blessed One, said by the Arahant, so I have heard: "Monks, there are these two kinds of gifts: a gift of material things & a gift of the Dhamma. Of these two kinds of gifts, this is supreme: a gift of the Dhamma. There are these two kinds of sharing: sharing of material things & sharing of the Dhamma. Of these two kinds of sharing, this is supreme: sharing of the Dhamma. There are these two kinds of assistance: assistance with material things & assistance with the Dhamma. Of these two kinds of assistance, this is supreme: assistance with the Dhamma."

The gift he describes as supreme & unsurpassed,
the sharing the Blessed One has extolled:
who–confident in the supreme field of merit, wise, discerning–
wouldn't give it at appropriate times?
Both for those who proclaim it and those who listen, confident in the message of the One Well-Gone:
it purifies their foremost benefit–
    those heeding the message
    of the One Well-Gone.

Itivuttaka 99

This was said by the Blessed One, said by the Arahant, so I have heard: "It's with reference to Dhamma, monks, that I describe [a person as] a brahman with threefold knowledge, and not another as measured by citing & reciting. And how is it with reference to Dhamma that I describe [a person as] a brahman with threefold knowledge, and not another as measured by citing & reciting?

"There is the case where a monk recollects his manifold past lives, i.e., one birth, two… five, ten… fifty, a hundred, a thousand, a hundred thousand, many eons of cosmic contraction, many eons of cosmic expansion, many eons of cosmic contraction & expansion: 'There I had such a name, belonged to such a clan, had such an appearance. Such was my food, such my sensitivity to pleasure & pain, such the end of my life. Passing away from that state, I re-arose there. There too I had such a name, belonged to such a clan, had such an appearance. Such was my food, such my sensitivity to pleasure & pain, such the end of my life. Passing away from that state, I re-arose here.' Thus he recollects his manifold past lives in their modes & details.

"This is the first knowledge he has attained. Ignorance has been destroyed; knowledge has arisen; darkness has been destroyed; light has arisen–as happens in one who remains heedful, ardent, & resolute.

"Then again, the monk sees–by means of the divine eye, purified & surpassing the human–beings passing away & re-appearing, and he discerns how they are inferior & superior, beautiful & ugly, fortunate & unfortunate in accordance with their actions: 'These beings–who were endowed with bodily misconduct, verbal misconduct, & mental misconduct; who reviled noble ones, held wrong views and undertook actions under the influence of wrong views–at the break-up of the body, after death, have re-appeared in a plane of deprivation, a bad destination, a lower realm, hell. But these beings–who were endowed with bodily good conduct, verbal good conduct, & mental good conduct; who did not revile noble ones, who held right views and undertook actions under the influence of right views–at the break-up of the body, after death, have re-appeared in a good destination, a heavenly world.' Thus–by means of the divine eye, purified & surpassing the human–he sees beings passing away & re-appearing, and discerns how they are inferior & superior, beautiful & ugly, fortunate & unfortunate in accordance with their actions.

"This is the second knowledge he has attained. Ignorance has been destroyed; knowledge has arisen; darkness has been destroyed; light has arisen–as happens in one who remains heedful, ardent, & resolute.

"Then again, the monk–with the ending of effluents–remains in the effluent-free awareness-release & discernment-release, directly knowing & realizing it for himself right in the here-&-now.

"This is the third knowledge he has attained. Ignorance has been destroyed; knowledge has arisen; darkness has been destroyed; light has arisen–as happens in one who remains heedful, ardent, & resolute.

"It's in this way that, with reference to Dhamma, I describe [a person as] a brahman with threefold knowledge, and not another as measured by citing & reciting."

He knows his former lives.
He sees heavens & states of woe,
has attained the ending of birth,
is a sage who has mastered direct-knowing.

By means of these three knowledges he becomes a three-knowledge brahman.[1] He's what I call a three-knowledge man– not another,
citing, reciting.

Note

1. In the brahmanical religion, a "three-knowledge man" was one who had memorized the three Vedas. This verse takes the brahmanical term and gives it a new, Buddhist meaning.

Itivuttaka 100

This was said by the Blessed One, said by the Arahant, so I have heard: "I am a brahman, monks, always responsive to requests, open-handed, bearing my last body, an unsurpassed doctor & surgeon. You are my children, my sons, born from my mouth, born of the Dhamma, created by the Dhamma, heirs to the Dhamma, not heirs in material things.

"There are these two kinds of gifts: a gift of material things & a gift of the Dhamma. Of these two kinds of gifts, this is supreme: a gift of the Dhamma.

"There are these two kinds of sharing: sharing of material things & sharing of the Dhamma. Of these two kinds of sharing, this is supreme: sharing of the Dhamma.

"There are these two kinds of assistance: assistance with material things & assistance with the Dhamma. Of these two kinds of assistance, this is supreme: assistance with the Dhamma.

"There are these two kinds of mass-donations: a mass-donation of material things & a mass-donation of the Dhamma. Of these two kinds of mass-donations, this is supreme: a mass-donation of the Dhamma."

He who, unstinting, made the mass-donation of Dhamma,
the Tathāgata,
sympathetic to all beings:
    to one of that sort
–the best of beings, human & divine– living beings pay homage– to one gone
    to the beyond
    of becoming.

Itivuttaka 101

This was said by the Blessed One, said by the Arahant, so I have heard: "Monks, these four things are next to nothing, both easy to gain & blameless. Which four? Cast-off cloth is next to nothing, both easy to gain & blameless. Alms food is next to nothing, both easy to gain & blameless. The root of a tree as a dwelling place is next to nothing, both easy to gain & blameless. Medicine made of smelly urine[1] is next to nothing, both easy to gain & blameless. These are the four things that are next to nothing, both easy to gain & blameless. When a monk is content with what is next to nothing, easy to gain & blameless, then I say that he has one of the component factors of the contemplative life."

Content with what's blameless, next to nothing,
    easy to gain,
his mind not vexed over lodging, clothing,
    food, or drink:
the four directions offer him
no obstruction.
These things, declared congenial for the contemplative life, are possessed by the monk heedful, content.

Note

1. This is one of a monk's basic requisites. There is some disagreement as to whether it refers to medicine pickled in urine, or to the use of urine as a medicine (as is still practiced in parts of Asia today).

This itivuttaka is identical with AN 4:27.

Itivuttaka 102

This was said by the Blessed One, said by the Arahant, so I have heard: "Monks, for one knowing & seeing, I tell you, there is the ending of effluents, not for one not knowing & seeing. For one knowing what & seeing what is there the ending of effluents? For one knowing & seeing, 'This is stress,' there is the ending of effluents. For one knowing & seeing, 'This is the origination of stress,' there is the ending of effluents. For one knowing & seeing, 'This is the cessation of stress,' there is the ending of effluents. For one knowing & seeing, 'This is the path of practice leading to the cessation of stress,' there is the ending of effluents. For one knowing in this way and seeing in this way is there the ending of effluents."

> For a learner in training
> along the straight path, there arises:
> first, the knowledge of ending;
> then, the gnosis unsurpassed;
> then, the gnosis of one released– > release-knowledge, superlative, > the knowledge of ending:
> 'The fetters are ended.'
> Certainly not by the lazy fool > uncomprehending,
> is there attained
> Unbinding,
> the loosening of all ties.

Itivuttaka 103

This was said by the Blessed One, said by the Arahant, so I have heard: "Monks, any contemplatives or brahmans who do not discern, as it has come to be, that 'This is stress,' … that 'This is the origination of stress,' … that 'This is the cessation of stress,' who do not discern, as it has come to be, that 'This is the path of practice leading to the cessation of stress': to me these contemplatives & brahmans do not count as contemplatives among contemplatives or as brahmans among brahmans. Furthermore, they do not enter & remain in the goal of the contemplative life or the goal of brahmanly life, having directly known & realized it for themselves right in the here-&-now.

"But any contemplatives or brahmans who discern, as it has come to be, that 'This is stress,' … that 'This is the origination of stress,' … that 'This is the cessation of stress,' who discern, as it has come to be, that 'This is the path of practice leading to the cessation of stress': to me these contemplatives & brahmans count as contemplatives among contemplatives and as brahmans among brahmans. Furthermore, they enter & remain in the goal of the contemplative life & the goal of the brahmanly life, having directly known & realized it for themselves right in the here-&-now."

Those who don't discern stress,
stress's coming into play,
& where it totally stops,
    without trace,
who don't know the path,
the way to the stilling of stress:
    lowly
in their awareness-release & discernment-release,
    incapable

of making an end,
        they're headed
        to birth & aging.

But those who discern stress,
stress's coming into play,
& where it totally stops,
        without trace,
who discern the path,
the way to the stilling of stress:
        consummate
in their awareness-release & discernment-release,
        capable
of making an end,
        they are not headed
        to birth & aging.

Itivuttaka 104

This was said by the Blessed One, said by the Arahant, so I have heard: "Monks, those monks who are consummate in virtue, consummate in concentration, consummate in discernment, consummate in release, consummate in the knowledge & vision of release; who exhort, demonstrate, instruct, urge, rouse & encourage; who are competent rightly to point out the true Dhamma: seeing them, I tell you, accomplishes a great deal; listening to them… approaching them… attending to them… recollecting them… following them in going forth accomplishes a great deal. Why is that?

"By associating with monks of this sort, sharing with them, attending to them, the as-yet-unculminated aggregate of virtue goes to the culmination of its development, the as-yet-unculminated aggregate of concentration goes to the culmination of its development, the as-yet-unculminated aggregate of discernment goes to the culmination of its development, the as-yet-unculminated aggregate of release goes to the culmination of its development, the as-yet-unculminated aggregate of knowledge & vision of release goes to the culmination of its development. Monks of this sort are said to be teachers, caravan leaders, abandoners of strife, dispellers of darkness, makers of light, makers of radiance, makers of brightness, makers of brilliance, bringers of illumination, noble ones, endowed with eyes that see."

This is a condition creating joy
for those who know:
living the Dhamma
of the noble ones,
composed in mind.
They brighten the true Dhamma, illumine it,

shining brilliantly.
They are makers of light,
enlightened,
abandoners of strife.
They have eyes
that see.
Having heard their message with right gnosis, the wise directly knowing
the ending of birth,
come to no further becoming.

Itivuttaka 105

This was said by the Blessed One, said by the Arahant, so I have heard: "Monks, there are these four birthplaces of craving where a monk's craving, when taking birth, takes birth. Which four? Either for the sake of cloth a monk's craving, when taking birth, takes birth. Or for the sake of alms food a monk's craving, when taking birth, takes birth. Or for the sake of lodging a monk's craving, when taking birth, takes birth. Or for the sake of becoming or not becoming this or that a monk's craving, when taking birth, takes birth. These are the four birthplaces of craving where a monk's craving, when taking birth, takes birth."

With craving his companion, a man
wanders on a long, long time.
Neither in this state here
nor anywhere else
does he go beyond
    the wandering- on.
Knowing this drawback–
that craving brings stress into play–
free from craving,
devoid of clinging,
mindful, the monk
    lives the mendicant life.

Itivuttaka 106

This was said by the Blessed One, said by the Arahant, so I have heard: "Monks, living with Brahma are those families where, in the home, mother & father are revered by the children. Living with the first devas are those families where, in the home, mother & father are revered by the children. Living with the first teachers are those families where, in the home, mother & father are revered by the children. Living with those worthy of gifts are those families where, in the home, mother & father are revered by the children. 'Brahma' is a synonym for mother & father. 'The first devas' is a synonym for mother & father. 'The first teachers' is a synonym for mother & father. 'Those worthy of gifts' is a synonym for mother & father. Why is that? Mother & father do much for their children. They care for them, nourish them, introduce them to this world."

Mother & father,
compassionate to their family, are called Brahma,
    first teachers,
    those worthy of gifts
    from their children.
So the wise should pay them homage,
        honor,
      with food & drink,
      clothing & bedding,
      anointing & bathing, & washing their feet.
Performing these services to their parents,
    the wise
      are praised right here

and after death
rejoice in heaven.

Itivuttaka 107

This was said by the Blessed One, said by the Arahant, so I have heard: "Monks, brahmans & householders are very helpful to you, as they provide you with the requisites of robes, alms food, lodgings, & medical requisites for the sick. And you, monks, are very helpful to brahmans & householders, as you teach them the Dhamma admirable in the beginning, admirable in the middle, admirable in the end; as you expound the holy life both in its particulars & in its essence, entirely complete, surpassingly pure. In this way the holy life is lived in mutual dependence, for the purpose of crossing over the flood, for making a right end to stress."

Householders & the homeless in mutual dependence
both reach the true Dhamma:
    the unsurpassed safety from bondage.
From householders, the homeless receive requisites: robes, lodgings, protection from inclemencies.

While in dependence on those well-gone, home-loving householders have conviction in Arahants of noble discernment,
    absorbed in jhāna.
Having practiced the Dhamma here– the path leading to good destinations– delighting in the deva world, they rejoice,
    enjoying sensual pleasures.

Itivuttaka 108

This was said by the Blessed One, said by the Arahant, so I have heard: "Monks, any monks who are deceitful, stubborn, talkers, frauds, arrogant, & uncentered are not followers of mine. They have turned away from this Dhamma-&-Vinaya. They attain, in terms of this Dhamma-&-Vinaya, no growth, increase, or abundance.

"But any monks who are not deceitful, not talkers, who are enlightened, pliant, & well-centered: they are followers of mine. They have not turned away from this Dhamma-&-Vinaya. They attain, in terms of this Dhamma-&-Vinaya, growth, increase, & abundance.

Deceitful, stubborn, talkers, frauds, arrogant, uncentered:
they don't grow in the Dhamma taught by the Rightly
Self-awakened One.

Not deceitful, not talkers, enlightened, pliant,
well-centered:
they grow in the Dhamma taught by the One Rightly
Self-awakened.

Itivuttaka 109

This was said by the Blessed One, said by the Arahant, so I have heard: "Monks, suppose a man were being carried along by the flow of a river, lovely & alluring. And then another man with good eyesight, standing on the bank, on seeing him would say, 'My good man, even though you are being carried along by the flow of a river, lovely & alluring, further down from here is a pool with waves & whirlpools, with seizers & demons. On reaching that pool you will suffer death or death-like pain.' Then the first man, on hearing the words of the second man, would make an effort with his hands & feet to go against the flow.

"I have given you this simile to illustrate a meaning. The meaning is this: the flow of the river stands for craving. Lovely & alluring stands for the six internal sense-media. The pool further down stands for the five lower fetters.[1] The waves stand for anger & distress. The whirlpools stand for the five strings of sensuality. The seizers & demons stand for the opposite sex. Against the flow stands for renunciation. Making an effort with hands & feet stands for the arousing of persistence. The man with good eyesight standing on the bank stands for the Tathāgata, worthy & rightly self-awakened."

Even if it's with pain, you should abandon
sensual desires
if you aspire
to future safety from bondage.
    Rightly discerning,
with a mind well released,
touch release now here,
    now there.
An attainer-of-wisdom,

having fulfilled the holy life,
is said to have gone to the end of the world, gone beyond.

Note

1. The five lower fetters are self-identity view, uncertainty, attachment to habits & practices, sensual passion, and resistance. See also AN 7:48 and AN 10:13.

Itivuttaka 110

This was said by the Blessed One, said by the Arahant, so I have heard: "If, while he is walking, monks, there arises in a monk a thought of sensuality, a thought of ill-will, or a thought of harmfulness, and he does not quickly abandon, dispel, demolish, or wipe that thought out of existence, then a monk walking with such a lack of ardency & compunction is called continually & continuously lethargic & low in his persistence.

"If, while he is standing.…

"If, while he is sitting.…

"If, while he is lying down, there arises in a monk a thought of sensuality, a thought of ill-will, or a thought of harmfulness, and he does not quickly abandon, dispel, demolish, or wipe that thought out of existence, then a monk lying down with such a lack of ardency & compunction is called continually & continuously lethargic & low in his persistence.

"But if, while he is walking, there arises in a monk a thought of sensuality, a thought of ill-will, or a thought of harmfulness, and he quickly abandons, dispels, demolishes, & wipes that thought out of existence, then a monk walking with such ardency & compunction is called continually & continuously resolute, one with persistence aroused.

"If, while he is standing.…

"If, while he is sitting.…

"If, while he is lying down, there arises in a monk a thought of sensuality, a thought of ill-will, or a thought of harmfulness, and he quickly abandons, dispels, demolishes, & wipes that thought out of existence, then a monk lying down with such ardency & compunction is called continually & continuously resolute, one with persistence aroused."

Whether walking, standing,

sitting, or lying down,
whoever thinks evil thoughts, related to the household life,
is following no path at all, smitten
with delusory things.
He's incapable,
a monk like this,
of touching superlative
self-awakening.
But whoever–
walking, standing,
sitting, or lying down–
overcomes thought,
delighting in the stilling of thought:
he's capable,
a monk like this,
of touching superlative
self-awakening.

Itivuttaka 111

This was said by the Blessed One, said by the Arahant, so I have heard: "Be consummate in virtue, monks, and consummate in the Pāṭimokkha. Dwell restrained in accordance with the Pāṭimokkha, consummate in your behavior & sphere of activity. Train yourselves, having undertaken the training rules, seeing danger in the slightest faults.

"When one is consummate in virtue, consummate in the Pāṭimokkha; dwelling restrained in accordance with the Pāṭimokkha, consummate in one's behavior & sphere of activity; training oneself, having undertaken the training rules, seeing danger in the slightest faults–what more is to be done?

"If, while he is walking, any greed in a monk is done away with, any ill will… any sloth & torpor… any restlessness & anxiety is done away with, any uncertainty is abandoned; if his persistence is aroused and not lax; if his mindfulness is established & unmuddled; if his body is calm & unaroused; if his mind is centered & unified: then a monk walking with such ardency & compunction is called continually & continuously resolute, one with persistence aroused.

"If, while he is standing.…

"If, while he is sitting.…

"If, while he is lying down, any greed in a monk is done away with, any ill will… any sloth & torpor… any restlessness & anxiety is done away with, any uncertainty is abandoned; if his persistence is aroused and not lax; if his mindfulness is established & unmuddled; if his body is calm & unaroused; if his mind is centered & unified: then a monk lying down with such ardency & compunction is called continually & continuously resolute, one with persistence aroused."

Controlled in walking,

controlled in standing, controlled in sitting,
controlled in lying down, controlled in flexing & extending his limbs –above, around, & below, as far as the worlds extend– observing the arising & passing away of phenomena,
of aggregates:
a monk who dwells thus ardently,
not restlessly, at peace–
always
mindful,
training in the mastery of awareness-tranquility– is said to be continually resolute.[1]

Note

1. This itivuttaka is identical with AN 4:12.

Itivuttaka 112

This was said by the Blessed One, said by the Arahant, so I have heard: "Monks, the world[1] has been fully awakened to by the Tathāgata. From the world, the Tathāgata is disjoined. The origination of the world has been fully awakened to by the Tathāgata. The origination of the world has, by the Tathāgata, been abandoned. The cessation of the world has been fully awakened to by the Tathāgata. The cessation of the world has, by the Tathāgata, been realized. The path leading to the cessation of the world has been fully awakened to by the Tathāgata. The path leading to the cessation of the world has, by the Tathāgata, been developed.[2]

"Whatever in this world with its devas, Māras, & Brahmās, in this generation with its contemplatives & brahmans, its royalty & commonfolk, is seen, heard, sensed, cognized, attained, sought after, pondered by the intellect, that has been fully awakened to by the Tathāgata. Thus he is called the Tathāgata.

"From the night the Tathāgata fully awakens to the unsurpassed Right Self-awakening to the night he is totally unbound in the Unbinding property with no fuel remaining,[3] whatever the Tathāgata has said, spoken, explained is just so (tatha) and not otherwise. Thus he is called the Tathāgata.

"The Tathāgata is one who does in line with (tathā) what he teaches, one who teaches in line with what he does. Because he is one who does in line with what he teaches, one who teaches in line with what he does, he is thus called the Tathāgata.

"In this world with its devas, Māras, & Brahmas, in this generation with its contemplatives & brahmans, its royalty & common people, the Tathāgata is the unconquered conqueror, total seer, the wielder of power.[4] Thus he is called the Tathāgata."

This is the meaning of what the Blessed One said. So with regard to this it was said:

Directly knowing all the world,
all the world as it really is,
    from all the world disjoined,
    in all the world unmatched.
Conquering all
in all ways,
enlightened,
released from all bonds,
he touches the foremost peace– Unbinding, free
    from fear.

He is free
        of effluent,
        of trouble,
    awakened,
        his doubts cut through;
has attained the ending of action, is released in the destruction of acquisitions.
He is blessed, awakened.
He is a lion, unsurpassed.
In the world with its devas
he set the Brahma-wheel going.[5]

Thus do divine & human beings who have gone to the Buddha for refuge, gathering, pay homage
to the great one, thoroughly mature:
  'Tamed, he's the best
    of those who can be tamed;
  calm, the seer
    of those who can be calmed; released, supreme among those who can be released; crossed, the foremost

of those who can cross.'

Thus they pay homage
to the great one, thoroughly mature:
'In this world with its devas, there's no one
to compare with you.'

This, too, was the meaning of what was said by the Blessed One, so I have heard.

Notes

1. SN 35:82 defines the "world" as the six sense spheres, their objects, consciousness at those spheres, contact at those spheres, and whatever arises in dependence on that contact, experienced as pleasure, pain, or neither pleasure nor pain.

2. This passage parallels, with one change, the duties appropriate to the four nobles truths: abandoning the origination of stress, realizing its cessation, and developing the path of practice leading to its cessation. The one deviation is that whereas the duty with regard to stress is to comprehend it, here the Tathāgata is disjoined from the world. See SN 56:11.

3. See §44.

4. These are epithets usually associated with the Great Brahma. See §22.

5. The Brahma-wheel = the Dhamma-wheel, the name of the Buddha's first sermon, so called because it contains a "wheel" that lists all twelve combinations of two variables: the four noble truths–stress, its origination, its cessation, and the way leading to its cessation–and the three levels of knowledge appropriate to each truth: knowledge of the truth, knowledge of the task appropriate to the truth, and knowledge that the task has been completed. This wheel constitutes the Buddha's most central teaching.

This itivuttaka is identical with AN 4:23.

Introduction to the Sutta Nipāta

The Sutta Nipāta—the Discourse Group—is the fifth text in the Khuddaka Nikāya, or Short Collection, which in turn is the fifth collection in the Sutta Piṭaka of the Pali Canon.

The collection totals 72 suttas in all, arranged in five chapters, and includes some of the most famous poems in the Pali Canon, such as the Discourse on Goodwill (Karaṇīya-Mettā Sutta, 1:8), the Discourse on Treasures (Ratana Sutta, 2:1), and the Discourse on Protection (Maṅgala Sutta, 2:4). It also contains two sets of poems that were apparently well-known in the Buddha's time as deep expressions of advanced points of doctrine: the Aṭṭhaka Vagga, a set of sixteen poems on the theme of non-clinging, and the Pārāyana Vagga, a set of sixteen dialogues, with a prologue and epilogue, in which the Buddha provides succinct answers to questions posed to him by brahmans who appear to have been adept in concentration practice. In addition to these more well-known poems, the collection also contains many useful instructions of a highly practical nature, covering everything from the most basic standards of conduct to the most subtle issues of discernment.[1]

The Sutta Nipāta differs from its neighbors in the Khuddaka—the Dhammapada, the Udāna, and the Itivuttaka—in that its suttas follow no standard form. All of them contain passages of poetry, but some suttas are entirely in verse, whereas others include prose passages as well. The poems vary greatly in length, the longest consisting of 63 verses; the shortest, of three. In some cases the longer poems present a continuous argument; in others, they are strings of short verses tied together by a common image or refrain. The longest poem in the collection, 3:9, combines both formats. The predominant verse form is the poetic dialogue, in which two or more people converse in verse—an ability that was highly prized in the Buddha's time—but there are other verse forms as well, including short monologues (such as 2:10), longer narratives (such as 3:1, 3:2, and 3:10), and poems appended to prose discourses as memory aids (as in 3:12).

Because the suttas collected here follow no standard form, we have to look elsewhere to get an idea of what holds the collection together and how it functions in the context of Dhamma as taught by the Pali Canon as a whole. Of course, it's possible that there is no overall unity to this collection, that its compilers simply gathered poems that didn't fit elsewhere in the Canon, but two points suggest otherwise.

1) To begin with, there is some overlap between the Sutta Nipāta and other poetic texts in the Canon. Five of its suttas—1:10, 2:5, 3:3, 3:7, and 3:9—are identical with suttas found in the Majjhima and Saṁyutta Nikāyas, and a sixth—1:4—is nearly identical with a sutta in the Saṁyutta. If the Sutta Nipāta were intended to be merely a repository of suttas left over from the rest of the Canon, there would have been no reason for this overlap.

2) A comparison of the poetic texts in the Pali Canon with texts from other early Buddhist traditions—such as Sanskrit texts found in Nepal, translations in the Chinese Canon, and Gāndhārī manuscripts found in Central Asia—shows that different traditions shared many of the same verses, but that they organized those verses in different ways. The Chinese Canon, for instance, contains a section composed of 16 poems similar to the 16 poems in the fourth chapter of the Sutta Nipāta—the Aṭṭhaka Vagga—but to two of those poems it adds verses found elsewhere in the Pali Canon. A Sanskrit text quotes the first dialogue in the fifth chapter of the Sutta Nipāta—the Pārānaya Vagga—inserting a question and answer that, in the Pali version, is found in a sutta later in the same chapter. Gāndhārī manuscripts contain versions of two poems in the Sutta Nipāta that are composed of strings of smaller verses tied together by a common refrain, but in each case the verses are arranged in a different order.

All of this suggests that compilers in each tradition were working with many of the same building blocks in putting together their Canons, but that they organized those blocks in different ways, in line with their own ideas of what made thematic or aesthetic sense.

So the question is, what pattern can we detect underlying the choice of suttas that compose the Sutta Nipāta? This question might yield a number of valid answers, but one fact about the collection suggests an answer that is especially useful in helping to understand and interpret the teachings it contains. That fact is the sheer number of times that brahmans play a role in these poems, and the number of poems that, even when not mentioning brahmans by name, discuss issues that would be especially important for brahmans learning about the Dhamma.

In focusing on this fact, there is the possible danger of limiting the message of the Sutta Nipāta too narrowly to its historical context, giving the impression that it deals exclusively with brahmanical issues in ancient India and missing its more universal import. But there are three reasons why understanding how the Buddha and his early followers dealt with the brahmans can actually help in understanding how the message of the Sutta Nipāta applies to our time as well.

1. Many of the issues raised by brahmanical teachings—such as racism, classism, the best use of wealth and status, and the desire to secure well-being both now and after death—are still very much alive.

2. The brahmans, along with the noble warriors, were the educated elite of ancient India. As the Sutta Nipāta portrays the brahmans of the Buddha's time, they were torn between pride in their education and culture on the one hand, and a sense that the training provided by their education was still uncertain and incomplete. This is similar to the situation in which we find ourselves now that the Dhamma is coming West: Westerners are proud of their education but often sense that it has not made them truly happy, and that something important is missing. The way the early Buddhists approached the pride and ambivalence of the brahmans gives useful lessons in how to deal with the pride and ambivalence of the West.

3. Brahmanical education focused not only on the content of brahmanical doctrines, but also on the language in which those doctrines were expressed. Thus the brahmans had very particular ideas about how to use words, to compose literary texts, and to conduct philosophical dialogues. Buddhists, to speak effectively to brahmans, had to satisfy the brahmans' expectations on these issues. And of course, some Buddhist monks themselves had obtained a brahmanical education before their ordination—or, as in the Buddha's case, seem to be conversant in the content of brahmanical education—so it would be natural for them to express themselves in the literary forms in which they had been trained from an early age.

As we will see, the suttas in the Sutta Nipāta portray the Buddha as being conversant not only with the content of brahmanical doctrines, but also with the brahmanical standards for how to present a teaching in a persuasive way. The problem for us, when reading these suttas, is that if we don't understand these standards, it's easy for us to miss what the Buddha is saying, and why he says it in the way he does. A prime example is his use of ambiguity and wordplay, which for the brahmans was a prized talent in philosophical dialogues, but for us—operating with different assumptions—can simply be confusing. But if we understand the background from which both the Buddha and his listeners were coming, it casts light on passages that otherwise would be obscure.

So the purpose of this introduction is to provide some information on that background, in hopes that it will be an aid in getting the most out of the act of reading the suttas in this collection.

A stock passage describing a highly educated brahman of the Buddha's time, found both in the Sutta Nipāta and in the four main nikāyas, runs as follows:

"He was a master of the Three Vedas [Knowledges] with their vocabularies, liturgy, phonology, etymology, & histories as a fifth; skilled in philology & grammar, he was fully versed in cosmology and in the marks of a Great Man."

Several terms in this description provide a good framework for analyzing the various ways in which the Sutta Nipāta deals with brahmanical issues. Under "Three Vedas" we will discuss how the Buddha redefined the three knowledges that constituted a true education, along with the ways in which he showed how Buddhist knowledge was superior to brahmanical knowledge. Under "liturgy," we will discuss the liturgical passages contained in the Sutta Nipāta. Under "history" we will discuss the ways in which the Sutta Nipāta rewrites brahmanical history on the one hand, and provides an alternative history, focused on the Buddha, on the other. Under "philology and grammar" we will discuss the ways in which passages in the Sutta Nipāta play with brahmanical assumptions on the use of language and literary forms; under "cosmology," we will discuss how Buddhist cosmology as shown in the Sutta Nipāta dealt with—and challenged—brahmanical debates surrounding the structure of the universe; and under the "marks of a Great Man" we will discuss the ways in which the Sutta Nipāta presents the Buddha as the ultimate person, superior even to the Brahmās from which the brahmans claimed descent and with whom they hoped to gain union.

The Three Vedas were ancient religious texts that constituted the core of the brahmanical education. A person who had memorized these texts was called an attainer-of-knowledge (vedagū) or a three-knowledge person (tevijja). The Buddha adopted these terms and applied them to himself on the basis of the three knowledges he had gained on the night of his awakening: knowledge of previous births, knowledge of the passing away and re-arising of beings through the power of their actions, and knowledge of the ending of the mental effluents (āsava). He also asserted that the brahmanical use of the terms vedagū and tevijja was illegitimate, and that these words found their legitimate meaning only in a person who had mastered the same three knowledges that he had (3:9).

The Sutta Nipāta portrays several ways in which the Buddha convinces his brahmanical listeners of the validity of his claims. To begin with, he shows knowledge of a brahmanical hymn that was considered the highest expression of the Vedas (3:4, 3:7), and that the brahmans held to be their exclusive possession. This was a signal that he was not making his claims in ignorance, and instead had knowledge of an esoteric point in their education—implying that he knew other things about their education as well.

Although he recognized that there were good teachings in the brahmanical tradition, that most brahmans of the past had been serious meditators (2:7), and that some individual brahmans in the present were still holding to those traditions (5 Prologue), he maintained that, by and large, brahmans of the present day had fallen away from the good traditions of their past. Some were now nothing more than common householders, living in great luxury (2:7). Many passages in the Sutta Nipāta focus on criticizing the practices of brahmans in the Buddha's time, and from these passages we learn that the brahmans were a heterogeneous lot. The Buddha criticizes them for practicing useless austerities (2:2, 5:3), for engaging in philosophical debates (4:3, 4:5, 4:8, 4:11–13), for making their living through interpreting dreams and omens (2:13, 4:14), for believing that purity could be attained through rituals or through seeing specific sights or hearing specific sounds (4:4), and for conducting animal sacrifices (2:7).

In return, we learn that brahmans had criticized the early Buddhists for eating meat and doing no work, criticisms that are rebutted in 1:4 and 2:2.

On a more positive note, the Buddha most often shows the superiority of his Dhamma by simply teaching it, providing solid instruction based on the second and third knowledges he gained on the night of his awakening to clear up issues that the brahmans debated among themselves. Based on the second knowledge, he describes how lay people can reach heaven by behaving in a moral way—rather than by hiring brahmans to perform animal sacrifices (1:6–7, 1:10, 2:3–4, 3:3). He also teaches how to attain the brahmanical goal of reaching the Brahmā world (1:3, 1:8, 3:5). Based on the third knowledge, he teaches brahmans who are apparently advanced in their practice of concentration how to go beyond the dimension of nothingness and gain full release from rebirth (5:1–16).

Based on both the second and third knowledges he sets new standards for what it means to be learned, who qualifies as a good teacher, and the proper etiquette for treating one's teachers (2:8–10, 3:6, 3:10). In particular, in two suttas in the collection he makes it clear that teachers should not teach for a fee—which, of course, is a standard that would deprive many brahmans of their source of livelihood (1:4, 3:4).

He also redefines many brahmanical terms to bring them in line with both knowledges. Most importantly, he redefines the term "brahman" itself, saying that arahants—fully awakened people—are the only true brahmans, regardless of their caste at birth (3:9, 4:4–5, 4:9, 4:13, 4:15, 5:4–5). There are even cases, such as 5:14, where this redefinition is asserted by one of his brahman interlocutors. Underlying this redefinition is the general principle that one becomes a brahman, not by birth, but by one's actions (1:7, 3:6, 3:9). Here the Buddha is taking an issue that had already arisen among brahmans, and redefined the meaning of "action." As 3:9 shows—and it is supported by MN 93—brahmans themselves had debated whether mere birth to brahman parents was enough to qualify as a genuine brahman, or if one had to be virtuous and act in line with brahmanical practices as well. In other words, did status as a brahman require only birth or both birth and brahmanical action? The Buddha, however, removed both birth and brahmanical practices from the question entirely, making status as a brahman entirely a result of one's actions in line with the precepts and other factors of the path to awakening. In this way, he entirely rejected the racism and classism underlying both sides of the brahmanical argument. An individual's merit is thus purely a matter of his/her behavior, and has nothing to do with his/her race or cultural traditions.

Conversely, and in line with the same principle, the Buddha redefined the term "outcaste" so as to apply to any individual, regardless of caste at birth—even a brahman—who behaves in an immoral way (1:7).

Even the Buddhist term "arahant" is borrowed from the brahmans, giving it a new meaning. The word literally means "worthy one," and as 3:5 shows, it was applied to those who were held to be worthy recipients of the cake produced by a brahmanical sacrifice—"worthy" in the sense that giving to such recipients produced great merit for the donor (3:5). By calling fully awakened people "arahants," the Buddha was making the point that they are the most meritorious individual recipients of any gift.

Arahants are also given the title vedagū—attainer-of-knowledge—as a way of asserting that their knowledge is superior to that of the three brahmanical Vedas (2:8, 3:4–6, 3:12, 4:9, 4:15, 5 Prologue, 5:4).

A large number of suttas redefine another brahmanical term, that of the "sage" (muni), and describe in great detail how to behave so as to become a sage (1:1–3, 1:5, 1:12, 2:6, 2:11, 2:13, 3:4–5, 3:9, 3:11, 4:6–7, 4:9–10, 4:14–16, 5:1–2, 5:7, 5:9). An old brahmanical tradition identified a "sage" as a person who takes a vow of silence, thereby arriving at a state of peace (see Dhp 268). The Buddha, however, redefines the term so that sagehood (mona) and sagacity (moneyya) are a matter of one's actions and one's ability to attain total release from the cycle of rebirth: That, in his eyes, was what truly counted as arriving at peace. The concept of sage was so important in ancient India that Asoka, in his list of suttas that

Buddhists should listen to and ponder frequently, included a "Muni-gāthā," which may be identical to 1:12.

Liturgy. As noted above, the Buddha criticized the brahmans for their useless recitations. One sutta (2:4) tackles this point head on, asserting that protection (maṅgala) comes from one's actions, and providing a long list of actions that act as protection, ranging from not associating with fools to gaining arahantship. Pointedly, brahmanical recitations are not included in the list.

Nevertheless, the Sutta Nipāta contains two suttas that apparently served (and one of them still serves) a liturgical purpose. One, 2:1, is a blessing chant for general well-being that bases its efficacy on the truth of the noble attainments. The other, 4:13, is a chant that was apparently used to frame the ceremony of taking the precepts, placing it in the context of the Buddha's own original experience of saṁvega, thus providing the proper frame of mind for those who are taking the precepts.

In this way, although the early Buddhists criticized the brahmans for their useless liturgies, they did provide their followers with the comfort of protection so that they wouldn't be tempted to revert to brahmanical practices.

History. In a similar pattern, the Sutta Nipāta undercuts the histories that the brahmans told about themselves, while at the same time providing alternative histories of the Buddha to inspire its readers/listeners to practice the Dhamma. On the one hand, 2:7 provides a revisionist history of the brahmans that casts their sacrifices, in particular, in a very bad light: The brahmans composed their hymns and designed their animal sacrifices, not through divine inspiration, but through greed for wealth and status. Instead of being pleased by the sacrifices, as the brahmans maintained, the devas were horrified by them. Instead of bringing prosperity and harmony to the human race, the sacrifices brought disease, discord, and violence.

On the other hand, three suttas—3:1, 3:2, and the beginning of 3:11—provide inspiring histories of the Buddha's birth and quest for awakening. One of them, 3:2, contains passages describing the events in the Buddha's own words. The other two are told entirely in the third person. These histories fill the vacuum left when the brahmanical histories were discredited, providing alternative examples for what counts as heroic in the conduct of one's life. Tellingly, the Sutta Nipāta contains no history of the most important event in the Buddha's life: his awakening. It recounts only a few of the events leading there. There is no way of knowing why early Buddhists did not put the events of the night of the Buddha's awakening into verse, but it may have been that they didn't want the constraints of meter to get in the way of giving an accurate portrayal of the knowledges the Buddha gained in the course of that awakening.

Philology and grammar. Linguistic theory and usage were areas in which brahmanical knowledge appears to have been in flux throughout the ancient period in India. Of special interest for our purposes are brahmanical texts that lay down rules for how poetic texts should be composed. These texts postdate the Buddha's time by a few centuries, but they appear to have been based on earlier oral traditions developed among actors and directors in the very ancient, and very active, Indian theater. Poetry in the Pali Canon shows signs of having been composed in line with many of the aesthetic and literary theories of these texts. This indicates that the educated classes of the time—the brahmans and noble warriors—were familiar with those theories and had developed a taste for them. In fact, the Canon contains some of the earliest extant records of works composed in line with those theories.[2]

At the same time, it contains passages that appear to be contributions to the on-going development of those theories. However, not all the passages in the Canon—or even a poetic text like the Sutta Nipāta—were composed with an eye to their literary flair. In particular, many of the dialogues in the Sutta Nipāta appear to fall into another tradition, that of the philosophical enigmas posed as part of the brahmanical rituals.

Thus the discussion here will fall into three parts: an analysis of how some of the poems in the Sutta Nipāta follow the generally accepted literary theories of the time; a discussion of its contributions to those theories; and a treatment of how the tradition of the philosophical enigma influenced some of its more perplexing passages. Understanding these three topics will go a long way toward dismantling many of the misconceptions that have grown up around the way the Dhamma is expressed within the Sutta Nipāta.

General aesthetic theory. The central concept in ancient Indian aesthetic theory was that every artistic text should have rasa, or "savor," and the theory around savor was this: Artistic literature expressed states of emotion or states of mind called bhāva. The classic analysis of basic emotions listed eight: love (delight), humor, grief, anger, energy, fear, disgust, and astonishment. The reader/listener exposed to these presentations of emotion did not participate in them directly; rather, he/she savored them as an aesthetic experience at one remove from the emotion. Although the savor was related to the emotion, it was somewhat different from it. The proof of this point was that some of the basic emotions were decidedly unpleasant, whereas the savor of the emotion was meant to be enjoyed.

Each of the emotions had its corresponding savor, as follows:

love — sensitive
humor — comic grief — compassionate
anger — furious
energy — heroic
fear — apprehensive
disgust — horrific
astonishment — marvelous

Thus, for instance, a heroic character would feel energy, rather than heroism, but the reader/listener would taste that energy as heroic. Characters in love would feel their love, but the reader/listener, in empathizing with their love, would not experience love, but instead would taste that empathy as an experience of being sensitive.

An ideal work of literary art was supposed to convey one dominant savor, but if it was long enough, it was expected, like a good meal, to offer many subsidiary savors as well. The Sutta Nipāta is unlike the Dhammapada and Udāna in that it does not have a single dominant savor —in this respect, it's like the Itivuttaka—but many of its individual poems do. The most common savors in the collection are:

- the heroic (1:1–3, 1:11–12, 3:1–2, 3:4, 3:7–9, 3:11, the end of 3:12, 4:1–6, 4:9–10, 5:4, 5:6, 5 Epilogue) and

- the marvelous (1:4, 1:6, 1:9–10, 2:1, 2:4, 2:5, 3:4, 3:6–7, 3:9, 3:11, 5 Prologue & 5 Epilogue—although in the italicized cases the marvelous savor comes simply from the fact that the Buddha's interlocutors are devas and yakkhas).

In all these examples—and especially in the ones where the Buddha is doing battle with Māra and yakkhas—the heroic and marvelous savor surround the person of the Buddha, providing a particularly Buddhist perspective on what it means to be a hero, and what kind of people with what kinds of qualities should be regarded as amazing.

Less frequent in the Sutta Nipāta are the horrific savor (1:11, 3:10) and the apprehensive (the beginning of 4:15 and 5:16). In the case of 1:11, which goes into detail on the disgusting aspects of the body, the horrific savor is a direct inversion of the sensitive savor that would normally be evoked through descriptions of the human body in erotic poetry. In this way, it subverts the lust that stands in the way of awakening. The remaining cases of the horrific and apprehensive evoke a sense of horror and apprehension surrounding the dangers of rebirth.

In these ways, early Buddhists—beginning, presumably, with the Buddha himself—employed the concept of savor to make their poetry attractive while at the same time directing the concept toward a specifically Buddhist end: inspiring the qualities that will lead to awakening and freedom from the cycle of repeated birth and death.

One of the prime ways of giving savor to a literary text was through the use of ornamental language. Classical treatises devoted a great deal of space to discussions of how language could be used to convey different savors. Many of their recommendations had to do with the sound of the language, as in alliteration and rhyme, and so are hard to convey when translating. Others, however, do survive translation.

This is particularly true of three types of ornamentation: similes, metaphors, and a type of figure called a "lamp" (dīpaka). Lamps are a peculiarity of poetry in Indian languages, which are heavily inflected, a fact that allows a poet to use, say, one adjective to modify two different nouns, or one verb to function in two separate sentences. (The name of the figure derives from the idea that the two nouns radiate from the one adjective, or the two sentences from the one verb.) In English, the closest we have to this is parallelism combined with ellipsis. An example from the Sutta Nipāta is in 2:5—> thoughts fling the mind around,

> as boys, a (captive) crow

—where "fling around" functions as the verb-phrase in both clauses, even though it is elided from the second. This is how I have rendered some of the lamps in many of the poems, although in other cases, such as the end of 3:6, I have repeated the lamp word either to emphasize its double role or simply because it was hard to render into English syntax a parallel construction in which a single word would work effectively. I have flagged some examples of lamp words and phrases in the notes to the individual suttas.

By far the most common types of ornamentation are similes and metaphors. A list of the suttas in which they are found would include these:

Simile (upamā): 1:1, 1:3, 1:8–9, 1:12, 2:1, 2:3, 2:5–6, 2:8, 2:14, 3:1–2, 3:4–6, 3:8–12, 4:1–2, 4:4, 4:6–9, 4:14–16, 5 Prologue, 5:6, 5:11, 5 Epilogue.

Metaphor (which in the time of the Buddha was considered as a type of simile): 1:6, 1:9, 1:12, 2:1, 2:9, 2:13–14, 3:2, 3:6–7, 3:11–12, 4:7, 4:13, 4:15, 5 Prologue, 5:1–3, 5:6, 5:10, 5:13, 5 Epilogue.

Especially striking are the repeated similes that tie together the verses in 1:1 and 1:3, and the complete metaphor—in which several comparisons are drawn between the parts of two things—in 1:4.

Other ornaments frequently used in the Sutta Nipāta include:

Praise (guṇakīrtana): 1:9, 1:10, 2:7, 2:12–14, 3:3–7, 3:11, 4:2–6, 4:10, 4:16, 5 Prologue, 5:4–5, 5:11–12, 5:14, 5 Epilogue;

Admonitions (upadiṣṭa): 1:3, 2:6, 2:8, 2:10, 3:7–8, 3:10, 4:1–2, 4:7, 4:14, 4:16, 5:1, 5:5, 5:12, 5:15–16; and

Rhetorical questions (pṛcchā): 1:3, 1:5, 1:11, 2:8, 3:2, 3:12, 4:3, 4:8, 4:13, 5 Epilogue.

The praise is primarily directed toward the Buddha, as a way of enhancing the sense of the marvelous around his attainment and his ability to teach that attainment to others; the admonitions reflect the strong didactic tone in many of the suttas; and the rhetorical questions reflect the fact that many of the poems are presenting a reasoned argument of a particular point.

Ornaments less frequently used include:

Alliteration/rhyme (yamaka): 1:2, 3:6;
Ambiguity (akṣarasaṁghāta): 4:9, 4:13, 4:15, 5:11;
Benediction (āśis): 2:1;
Criticism (garhaṇa): 1:7, 2:6–7, 4:7–9;
Distinctions (viśeṣaṇa): 1:2, 1:5–7, 2:2–3, 3:9, 3:12, 4:3;
Encouragement (protsāhana): 2:8, 2:11, 4:16;
Entreaty (yācña): 2:1, 2:12, 5:12;
Etymology (nirukta): 3:6;
Examples (dṛṣtānta): 1:3, 1:7;
Explanations of cause and effect (hetu): 2:8, 3:12, 4:11–12;
Narration (ākhyāna): 1:7, 2:7, 2:14, 3:1–2, 4:15, 5 Prologue & 5 Epilogue; Prohibitions (pratiṣedha): 2:10, 3:10; and Wish (manoratha): 5:16.

Another way in which poetic language can convey savor is through a varied use of meters. Classic brahmanical poetry—such as the Vedas and the Upaniṣads—were composed primarily in two meters. But at approximately the time of the Buddha, new types of musical meters were being developed—"musical" both in the sense that they were inspired apparently by specific songs, and in the sense that two short syllables were precisely equal to one long syllable, just as two half notes equal one whole note in music. These meters quickly multiplied into a large variety of permutations, syncopated and not, that greatly expanded the repertoire of Indian poets from that time onward.

Although the majority of the suttas in the Sutta Nipāta are composed in the old meters, seven are composed in the new: 1:1, 2:13, and 3:6 are either entirely or primarily in combinations of the opacchandasaka and vetāliya meters; 1:8 and 4:14 are entirely or primarily in the ariyā meter;

4:6 is entirely in the vetāliya meter; and 3:10 is composed in several meters, including the vetāliya, vegāvatī, and dodhaka.[3] These meters are difficult to reproduce in English, but their existence in the Sutta Nipāta is worth noting for three reasons.

One is that their existence belies the idea, often advanced, that the style of the Sutta Nipāta is consistently old, and therefore must represent an old stratum in the Pali Canon. The fact that some of the poems are in the new meters shows that this is not necessarily the case. At the same time, however, their existence does not prove that the poems in which they were composed postdated the Buddha. There is no way of knowing when the meters were introduced, although the Canon contains hints that the new meters may have already been current in his time. For instance, a verse in one of the most famous poems in the Canon, the summary of the Ovāda Pāṭimokkha (Dhp 184), is composed in the opacchandasaka meter. The tradition teaches that the Buddha recited this poem during the first year of his teaching career, which—if the tradition is correct, and there are no grounds for doubting it—would indicate that the new meters were already in circulation when he was alive. Similarly, 3:6—one of the poetic dialogues composed in the new meters—mentions in passing that the Buddha was still young at the time when the dialogue took place, which also suggests that the meters did not postdate his time.

The second reason for noting the existence of the new meters in the Sutta Nipāta is that they were apparently meant to show that the Buddha was current with the latest developments in literary expression. In two of the cases where he uses them—2:13 and 3:6—he is speaking in response to questions posed in the new meters. Throughout the Sutta Nipāta, when a person opens a poetic dialogue with the Buddha, the Buddha always answers in the same meter (or meters) in which the question was posed. His ability to respond in the new meters was thus one more example of his skill with language.

Third, it's also worth noting that none of the interlocutors identified as brahmans in the Sutta Nipāta use any of the new meters. This may account for the larger number of suttas composed in the old meters: The brahmans themselves may have preferred the old meters because of their association with Vedic and other brahmanical texts. The old meters were thus "theirs." This would indicate that even with the existence of new meters, there would be reasons to compose new verses in the old style. The same point applies to the choice of vocabulary in these poems as well. Still, the compilers of the Sutta Nipāta included a few poems in the new style, showing that the Buddha and the tradition he founded were not bound by old ways of expression. They embraced the developments in poetics and the means of inducing savor when they saw that it would further their ends.

Nevertheless, despite the ornamental language used in some of its suttas, the Sutta Nipāta also contains a fairly large number of suttas that either provide none of the standard savors or, at most, convey those savors only weakly: 1:5, 1:8, 2:2–3, 2:6, 2:9, 2:11, 2:13–14, 3:5, 4:11–12, 4:16, 5:1–3, 5:7–15. This fact may be related to the strong didactic nature of the collection, but it also seems to be related to a particularly Buddhist contribution to ancient Indian aesthetic theory.

Buddhist aesthetic theory. It was common practice in ancient India for writers to announce the dominant savor they were trying to produce in their works, usually stating in passing that the savor of that particular work was the highest savor of all. This tendency carried over into the Pali Canon, where, for example, the Dhammapada—whose dominant savor is the Dhamma savor, traditionally a variant of the heroic—announces that Dhamma is the highest savor (Dhp 354).

Similarly, the Sutta Nipāta contains a passage identifying the highest savor—one, however, that is not one found in the standard list. In 1:10, the Buddha is quoted as saying that the highest savor is truth. This statement is nowhere explained, but it is echoed in the statement in 3:3 that "Truth indeed is deathless speech," and seems related to a remark that appears twice in the Pārānaya Vagga (5:8 and 5 Epilogue):

> In the past,
> before hearing Gotama's message,
> when anyone explained 'It is,' 'It will be,'
> all that was hearsay,
> quotation marks.
> All that promoted conjecture
> and gave me no pleasure.

In other words, for a person seeking truth, there is only one savor that is genuinely satisfying: the savor of a direct statement of the truth. Thus, even though many of the poems in the Sutta Nipāta provided pleasure in their use of ornamental language, that use was meant to serve a higher purpose, the conveying of truth—and was truly satisfying only to the extent that it allowed the truth to shine through. And as the passages in 1:10 and 5:8 seem to be saying, even an unornamented passage, if it states the truth, has a savor that gives pleasure to a person tired of hearsay.

Because the Canon gives no further explanation of truth as a savor, it's hard to tell whether the Buddha proposed this savor as a ninth addition to the standard list of eight or as a subset of one of the eight: the savor of the marvelous. This latter possibility is suggested by the Buddha's reference in DN 11 and AN 3:61 to the miracle of instruction:

"And what is the miracle of instruction? There is the case where a monk/person gives instruction in this way: 'Direct your thought in this way, don't direct it in that. Attend to things in this way, don't attend to them in that. Let go of this, enter and remain in that.'"

This instruction is miraculous because, in the Buddha's hands, it can lead to a direct and true experience of unbinding.

The sense that genuine truth is miraculous is also suggested by 2:1, in which the statement of truths about the noble attainments is said to have the power to bring about well-being. And it is suggested by the many passages elsewhere in the Canon where, after the Buddha states an especially perceptive truth, his listener(s) comment that it is amazing and astounding how well he has stated it (see, for example, MN 82, MN 87, MN 106, and SN 42:11).

Whether the savor of truth was meant to be an independent savor or a variant of the marvelous, the high position that the Sutta Nipāta gives to the savor of truth relates to another specifically Buddhist point of aesthetic theory: the Canon's classification of poets into four types. The classification is found at AN 4:231:

"Monks, there are these four kinds of poets. Which four? The thought-poet, the heard-poet, the meaning (attha)-poet, and the extemporaneous poet. These are the four kinds of poets."

The Canon does not explain these terms, and they are not found in any other records of ancient Indian aesthetic theory. The Commentary states that the thought-poet invents stories, the heard-poet retells old legends, the meaning-poet gets to the meaning of things, and the extemporaneous poet comes up with a new poem on the spot.

Of the four, the meaning-poet is most concerned with the truth, and his accomplishment is pleasurable in direct relationship to his ability to convey the savor of truth in his poetry. This is precisely the role that the Buddha plays throughout the Sutta Nipāta. Even more impressive is when the meaning-poet can at the same time play the role of the extemporaneous poet, which the Buddha does in all of the poetic dialogues except one: 1:2, 1:4–7, 1:9–10, 2:4–5, 2:9, 2:13–14, 3:2, 3:4–7, 3:9–11, 4:7, 4:8–14, 4:16, 5 Prologue, and 5:1–16. The one exception is 2:2, where the main speaker is not our Buddha, but a previous one: the Buddha Kassapa.

In translation, it may be hard to fully appreciate the Buddha's accomplishment as a combined meaning- and extemporaneous poet, but it's possible to gain at least some sense of his level of skill by comparing his verses with those of three other extemporaneous poets portrayed in the Sutta Nipāta: Ven. Vaṅgīsa in 2:12 and 3:3; Sabhiya in 3:6; and Sela in 3:7. In only one case—Ven. Vaṅgīsa in 3:3—do these poets display anything near the Buddha's ability to convey useful, detailed truths in extemporaneous verse.

Philosophical enigmas. Even though the meaning of the vast majority of the Buddha's verses is direct and clear, there are a few cases where the verses seem deliberately ambiguous or obscure. On the surface, this would seem to be a flaw in a meaning-poet, but verses of this sort have to be understood in the context of another ancient Indian tradition: the philosophical enigma. Evidence in the Rig Veda shows that ancient Vedic ritual included contests in which elder brahmans used puns and other wordplay to express philosophical teachings as riddles that contestants were then challenged to solve. The purpose of these contests was to teach the contestants—usually students studying to become ritual experts—to use their powers of ingenuity in thinking "outside the box," in the justified belief that the process of searching for inspiration and being illuminated by the answer would transform the mind in a much deeper way than would be achieved simply by absorbing information.[4] In other words, there are occasions when ambiguity can be a useful pedagogical tool.

The Canon contains occasional examples in which the Buddha seems to be deliberately following this tradition. In MN 18 and MN 138, for instance, he makes an enigmatic statement and then, without allowing any time for questions, gets up from his seat and enters his dwelling, leaving it to the monks to figure out for themselves what the statement meant. In SN 1:1 he answers a deva's question—"Tell me, dear sir, how you crossed over the flood"—with a paradox: "I crossed over the flood without pushing forward, without staying in place." Apparently, his purpose there was to subdue her pride. In other cases, he plays with words in a shocking way to shake up his listeners' sense of language—as when, in Dhp 97, he says that the ultimate person is akataññū, which can mean both "ungrateful" and "knowing the unmade." In still other cases, he quotes a passage from one of his own poems and then interprets it in a way that is not at all obvious from the surface meaning of the passage (see 5:3, note 5). The purpose in these cases is apparently to convey the point that some of his statements have multiple levels of meaning and so are worth pondering in depth.

The problem with this sort of pedagogical tool is that it can be understood only in context. Outside of that context, it can seem strange and even lead to confusion. This is true of several passages in the Sutta Nipāta, but two examples in particular stand out. The first is 3:6, in which the Buddha is asked to define a long list of terms, and many of his definitions revolve around wordplay. In the context of the philosophical enigma, this sort of wordplay was highly prized, which is why Sabhiya, the Buddha's interlocutor, is so impressed by it. Outside of that context, the wordplay loses its force.

Another even more serious example is the grammatical pun that lies at the heart of the Buddha's dialogue with Māgandiya in 4:9. On the surface, the pun seems to be saying that the goal is not by means of views, learning, knowledge, habits, or practices, but that it cannot be attained except through views, learning, knowledge, habits, or practices. Actually, though, the grammatical case indicating "by means of" in Pali can also mean "in terms of": Thus the passage actually means that the goal is not defined in terms of those things, but it cannot be attained except through those things—a point made in many other passages in the Canon as well. As with the deva in SN 1:1, the Buddha's purpose in making this pun was apparently to subdue Māgandiya's pride. Māgandiya, unfortunately, caught only the surface meaning, and so was confused. Even more unfortunately, many scholars today catch only the surface meaning, which has led to many misunderstandings. But if we keep in mind the fact that many of the dialogues in the Sutta Nipāta were intended for people whose sense of the philosophical dialogue included a taste for the philosophical enigma, we can be alert to look for deeper meanings in cases where the surface meaning of a passage may seem contradictory or ambiguous. I have tried to provide notes to help unlock many of these enigmas, but there may be instances that I have missed. Reading and interpreting ancient poetry, even with a sense of ancient context, requires care.

Cosmology. In SN 12:48, a brahman cosmologist approaches the Buddha and asks where he stands on the two big issues that cosmologists at the time debated in an attempt to base their cosmology on first principles: (1) whether everything exists or doesn't exist; and (2) whether everything is a oneness or a plurality. The Buddha refuses to take a stance on either issue, saying that all four positions given in answer to these questions are "extremes," and that he avoids these extremes with his teaching on dependent co-arising (paṭicca samuppāda). Because dependent co-arising is essentially a teaching on how the actions of the mind can give rise to suffering and can put an end to suffering, he is stating in effect that the most important principle in understanding the cosmos is not the nature of its existence, but the efficacy of actions, delineating which actions are skillful or unskillful in putting an end to suffering, along with the possible consequences of acting in either way.

In 3:9, the Buddha states this point in this way:

> The wise see action [kamma] in this way
> as it has come to be,
> seeing dependent co-arising,
> cognizant of action's results.
> Through action the world rolls on.
> People roll on through action.

In action are beings held bound together,
as in a linchpin,
a chariot traveling along.

When considering the possible consequences of action, the brahmans of the Buddha's time were primarily concerned with two issues: whether there was life after death and, if there was, what kind of actions in this lifetime might play a role in shaping that life. Several of the classic Upaniṣads—such as the Bṛhadāraṇyaka, Chāndogya, and Kāṭha Upaniṣads—accepted the possibility of life after death, although they differed among themselves as to how one's actions might affect the way in which one was reborn. The Chāndogya Upaniṣad, for instance, taught that actions played a role in the post mortem fate of only middling and lower beings. Brahmans with knowledge of the self, it taught, were higher beings who would not be affected by their actions, and instead were guaranteed union with Brahmā after death (ChU V.3–10).

However, not all brahmans of the Buddha's time believed in the possibility of rebirth. DN 1 reports the existence of brahmans and contemplatives who, for various reasons, taught that the self was annihilated at death. In one case, these brahmans defined the self in a way similar to the views of modern materialists as to what constitutes a person: A person is nothing but a body, and so no longer exists after death.

So when the Buddha gained his second knowledge on the night of his awakening—knowledge of the passing away and re-arising of beings in line with their actions—he was not simply following an assumption shared by everyone in his culture. He saw that rebirth was a fact, and that it was shaped by the skillfulness of one's actions, which in turn were shaped by one's views. He also saw that one's caste in this lifetime played no role in determining one's future course after death.

This was a point on which he differed radically from the beliefs of many of the brahmans of his time. Among the brahmans who believed in rebirth, many also believed that their status as brahmans prevented them from falling into lower states after death. Instead, they were at the very least guaranteed rebirth in the brahman caste in the next life. This is one of the reasons why they debated whether having simply been born in the brahman caste was enough to earn this guarantee, or if one had to follow brahmanical traditions as well.

As we have already noted, the Buddha redefined this question by making the action that qualifies one as a brahman, not a matter of brahmanical traditions, but a matter of virtue and all the other skills that lead to full awakening.

This meant that neither brahmanical birth nor brahmanical traditions could guarantee a good rebirth after death, a point that the Buddha makes clear in 1:7:

> Though born into a family of scholars,
> brahmans, with chants as their kinsmen,
> are repeatedly seen with evil deeds:
> blameworthy in the here-&-now,
> with a bad destination in the afterlife.
> Their birth doesn't prevent them
> from blame & a bad destination.

As for the range of possible destinations that await a person after death, the Sutta Nipāta does not give a complete account. It simply notes that the Buddha knows the way to the Brahmā world (3:5), and that he also has directly known hell and the way leading to hell (3:10). Also, the many suttas in which devas and yakkhas appear or are mentioned (1:6, 1:9–10, 2:4–5, 2:14, 3:6) indicate that these levels of beings are among those from which one may come to the human world and to which, depending on one's actions, one may be reborn.

So the Sutta Nipāta's teachings on rebirth and action challenged a wide variety of views that brahmans held at the time. This is an important point to remember when we consider how these teachings challenge modern views on these topics as well. Instead of bowing to the beliefs of his culture, the Buddha maintained the truth of what he had known and seen, and what he regarded as useful—in light of that knowledge and vision—for the long-term welfare and happiness of his listeners.

Marks of a Great Man. For a modern reader, some of the least appealing passages in the Sutta Nipāta concern the brahmanical view that there were 32 marks to look for in a great man—one who would either become a universal monarch or a Rightly Self-Awakened One—and the corresponding Buddhist assertion that the Buddha was endowed with all 32 marks. These passages, found in 3:7 and 5 Prologue, seem to be in direct contradiction to the Buddha's own assertion in 3:9 that a person's physical attributes are no measure of his/her worth.

Nevertheless, these passages are best understood as part of a strategy to convince brahmans that the Buddha was worthy of the highest respect. And fortunately, the compilers of the Sutta Nipāta provided plenty of examples to show that the Buddha really did possess the excellence of which the marks were supposed to be signs.

The most immediate proof of the Buddha's excellence lies in the quality of his teaching, and in particular his understanding of the intricacies of the mind and how they can be mastered so as to put an end to suffering. As is typical of the poetry in the Khuddaka Nikāya, most of the poems in the Sutta Nipāta give no more than brief mention to many of the Buddha's basic teachings—such as the noble truths and their duties (2:1, 2:4, 3:7), the five hindrances (1:1), the five faculties (2:11), mindfulness (1:4, 1:8, 2:11, 3:2, 3:4–6, 3:12, 4:1, 4:10, 4:14, 4:16, 5:1–2, 5:4–6, 5:8, 5:10, 5:12–13, 5:15), jhāna (1:1, 1:9, 1:12, 3:2, 3:5, 3:9, 3:11, 4:14, 4:16, 5:13), unbinding (1:5, 1:10–11, 2:1, 2:4, 2:13, 3:3, 3:6, 3:12, 4:7, 4:14–15, 5:5, 5:8, 5:10, 5:13), and the ending of birth (1:4, 1:12, 2:1, 2:12, 3:4–7, 3:9, 3:12, 5:3–4, 5:7, 5:10–11, 5:16).

However, three poems give very detailed instructions on practical points of Dhamma—direct proof that the Buddha was an excellent teacher. The descriptions of goodwill practice in 1:8, of body contemplation in 1:11, and of the factors of dependent co-arising, rendered in poetry and prose in 3:12, are among the most detailed instructions on those topics found anywhere in the Canon. At the same time, the subtle points of doctrine discussed in the Aṭṭhaka Vagga and Pārānaya Vagga show that the Buddha had really mastered the ways of the mind and could offer practical instruction to others in how to attain that mastery as well.

In addition to technical discussions of doctrine, the suttas here also show how the Buddha taught an admirable set of values. Many of these values fall under the eight headings listed in AN 8:51 as proof that a teaching qualifies as genuine Dhamma: if, when put into practice, it is conducive to being unfettered (1:3, 4:10), to gaining dispassion (2:14, 4:1, 4:4, 4:6, 4:9, 5:6), to shedding pride and conceit (2:14, 4:3, 4:5, 4:8–10, 4:14–15), to modesty (2:9, 4:3, 3:11, 4:8, 4:10, 4:14), to contentment (1:12, 2:14, 3:11, 4:16), to reclusiveness (1:3, 2:14, 3:11), to aroused persistence (2:10, 3:2, 4:14, 4:16), and to being unburdensome (3:11, 4:16).

In line with the teaching that all skillful qualities are rooted in heedfulness (AN 10:15), several of the suttas focus on the need for heedfulness in the face of the fact of death and separation (3:8, 4:6), and the corresponding need to overcome attachment to the body (1:11), greed and sensuality (4:1), and sexual intercourse (4:7).

The ultimate proof of the value of these teachings, of course, comes only when the reader/listener puts them to use and finds that they do, in fact, lead to the ending of suffering and stress (MN 27). But the Sutta Nipāta also provides provisional proof in the way it depicts the Buddha's demeanor as an embodiment of how these teachings are lived. He is able to read minds (5 Prologue). He is ready with an answer to all the questions put to him (except in 4:8, where he is distrustful of his listener's motivation in looking for an argument), and he shows many admirable attributes in the way he engages with his interlocutors. For instance, in 2:7 and 3:9, he doesn't criticize brahmans until brahmans directly ask for his opinion of them and their traditions. In 3:6 he shows an open readiness to answer questions that had sparked other religious teachers to behave in a surly and impolite way.

All of this prepares the reader/listener to accept the many passages in the Sutta Nipāta devoted to praise of the Buddha. In line with a passage from DN 16—saying that the Buddha is praised by those who themselves are worthy of praise—the suttas here quote the praise that brahmans, excellent poets, and even supernatural beings have bestowed on him (1:9, 1:10, 2:1, 2:12, 2:14, 3:3, 3:6–7, all of 5). Some of the terms of this praise had special meaning for brahmans: In 3:5 and 3:7, brahmans actually call him Brahmā, their highest possible praise, and in 3:4–5 and 3:7, they agree that the Buddha and his noble disciples are the most deserving recipients of brahmanical sacrificial gifts.

They also call him the "One with Eyes" or the "All-around Eye" (1:2, 1:9, 2:12, 2:14, 3:9, 5 Prologue, 5:5, 5:6, 5:9, 5 Epilogue), terms that require special explanation. From Vedic times, a person's spiritual power was thought to reside in his/her eyes. The power of the eye was indicative not only of the ability to see—and thus being an "Eye" meant that one had especially penetrating knowledge of things—but also of the ability to grant blessings or inflict curses with a glance. This is why it was considered auspicious to gaze into the eyes of a holy person or heavenly being, and to be gazed upon by such a being as well. Moreover, divine beings were thought to be "all eye," in the sense that they could see with every part of their body. Thus simply to be in their presence or to see any part of their body was considered a blessing.[5] So when the poems here call the Buddha an Eye or and All-around Eye, they are treating the Buddha as a divine being of great power and insight.

However, they do not stop with depicting the Buddha simply in these terms, or even as the highest figure in the brahmanical cosmos. He is something higher. All of the awakened, the poems say, have gone beyond the Brahmā world (3:6), and their course can't even be known by devas (this includes Brahmās) or human beings (3:9, 5:6). In 3:10, a Brahmā bows down to the Buddha as a sign that he recognizes the Buddha's superiority—and that all other beings, brahmans included, should do so as well.

Perhaps even more impressive than the praise showered on the Buddha is the way in which he responds to that praise. He is not abashed by it—after all, as he notes in DN 1, there is no way that the praise given by others can do full justice to his attainment. At the same time, though, he is not made proud by the praise. Instead, he looks to see what provoked it. In 3:7, for example, his response to Sela's high praise is first to affirm his status as Buddha, but then to penetrate further to the fact that Sela's praise is actually motivated by doubt. So the main thrust of his response to Sela is to address that doubt directly. In other words, his concern is less with his own image in the eyes of others, and more with the genuine well-being of others, whether they give him praise or blame.

When we understand the various ways in which the Sutta Nipāta engages the main elements of brahmanical education—the Vedas, liturgy, history, philology and grammar, cosmology, and the marks of a Great Man —we can see that the Buddha and his early followers borrowed many of their concepts and techniques of expression from the brahmans. On one level, this is only natural, in that the Buddha and his more literate followers had received a brahmanical education or were familiar with its terms. This was the language in which they were already trained to think.

However, as a general principle, they did not allow the brahmans or brahmanical education to set the agenda as to what and how they taught. Everything from Indian culture, whether new or old, was evaluated as to how it did and didn't fit in with the Buddha's own three knowledges as gained on the night of his awakening—and if it didn't fit, how it might be altered to further the Buddhist purpose of teaching the path of awakening to others.

The Sutta Nipāta contains only one sutta that breaks with this general principle. In 3:7, brahmanical traditions set the terms of the discussion. Sela is impressed with the Buddha simply because the latter exhibits all 32 marks of the Great Man, and because his response to praise falls in line with what Sela had learned from "the aged line of teachers." The Buddha, in response to Sela's questions, does not encourage Sela to have faith in him only after having tested his teachings (see MN 95, AN 3:66, and AN 4:192). Instead, he simply tells Sela to abandon his doubts immediately. How this sutta was received by brahmans of the time may be indicated by the fact that it was translated into Sanskrit and included in the Divyāvadāna. But from a modern perspective the sutta is one of the weakest in the collection, conveying the least amount of practical Dhamma. Thus, even though it is an exception to the general principle of not allowing brahmanical beliefs to set the agenda in conveying the Dhamma, it shows the wisdom of the general principle with which it breaks.

From this perspective, we can see that the Buddhist appropriation of brahmanical terms was strategic. In some cases, the Sutta Nipāta uses brahmanical terms in a way that preserves their original brahmanical meaning. In others, it gives new meanings to those terms so that they will fit with the entirely new standard, set by the Buddha's awakening, for what counts as knowledge and what that knowledge can enable people to do.

Similarly with brahmanical practices: In some cases, such as animal sacrifice and racism, the brahmanical practice is denounced and rejected outright. In others, such as the practice of sacrifice in general, or in the conduct of philosophical debates, certain key concepts—such as the means of sacrifice, the merit of donation to a worthy recipient, the use of philosophical enigmas—are converted to serve the purpose of a culture devoted to awakening.

Although the act of reading the Sutta Nipāta at present requires that we step outside of our own educational background to develop an appreciation for the background that the poems here assume, we can take these poems as lessons in how to understand the Dhamma in relation to our own context: using the Buddha's awakening as a standard for determining what in our culture can serve the purposes of our own awakening, and what needs to be redefined and reimagined if it is to serve that end.

A NOTE ON THE TRANSLATION

The primary foundation for this translation is the Thai edition of the Pali text, printed by Mahāmakut Rājavidyālaya, Bangkok, 1980. I have also consulted Sri Lankan and Burmese editions available online through the Journal of Buddhist Ethics and the Digital Pali Reader. All of these texts have their flaws, so I have had to make choices among them. In cases where the Thai text contained readings that were obviously wrong, I have chosen readings from one or both of the other sources. In cases where none of the variant readings in the different editions seemed obviously better than the others, I have stood by the Thai reading because there already exist English translations based on the Sri Lankan and Burmese editions; I felt that the Thai edition should have its chance to speak to the larger world.

The attempt to render Pali verse into set meters in English, in imitation of the meters in the original, leads inevitably to distortions, in which words are cut from some lines, and extraneous words are used to pad others to maintain the meter. To avoid this sort of misrepresentation, I have chosen to render the poems here into free verse, as this allows for the fewest distortions in meaning, as well as for the ability to highlight parallel constructions and to emphasize words that are emphasized in the original in ways that normal English prose syntax would not allow.

Notes

1. There is no firm evidence that any other early Buddhist tradition had a text corresponding to the Sutta Nipāta. However, there is one text suggesting that at least one other tradition might have had such a collection. That text is the Milinda Pañhā—the Questions of King Milinda. This text exists now in a Pali rendering, which in Myanmar is actually considered as part of the Pali Canon. Internal evidence, however, suggests that the text came originally from another tradition. Its dialogues often quote the words of the Buddha, but in many cases the quotations cannot be traced to any part of the existing Pali Canon—a sign that the text possibly had its origins in a tradition that accepted different records of what the Buddha had said. However, in five of the dialogues the text quotes short passages that it identifies as "in the Sutta Nipāta," and which are found in the Pali Sutta Nipāta. (The passages are found in 1:2, 1:12, 2:6, and 3:11.) Of course, the phrase "in the Sutta Nipāta" may have been added when the text was translated into Pali, but at the very least it leaves open the possibility that the Pali tradition was not the only one to have such a compilation.

As for records of other traditions as they relate to the Sutta Nipāta: In addition to those mentioned here in the Introduction, two complete Sanskrit texts—the Mahāvastu from the Lokottaravādin school, and the Divyāvadāna from the Mūlasarvāstivādin school—contain versions of some of the suttas. The Mahāvastu contains Sanskrit parallels with 1:3, 2:1, 3:1–2, 3:6, and 4:9; the Divyāvadāna, with 2:1, 3:7, and 4:9. A manuscript discovered in Central Asia contains fragments of four suttas from the Aṭṭhaka Vagga, 4:7–10. The Mahāyāna philosopher Asaṅga quotes Sanskrit versions of three short passages from 4:1, 4:13, and 5:1. Also, in addition to the Aṭṭhaka Vagga, there are passages from some of the other suttas in the Sutta Nipāta found in the Chinese Canon, but I do not have access to them.

In the case of parallels to which I do have access, I have not attempted to use them as a basis for altering the Pali in search of what might strike me as a more original version of any of the poems. Such judgments are inevitably subjective, and reveal more about the interpreter than about the text being interpreted. This point applies even more forcefully to Chinese versions of the Canon than to Sanskrit ones, in that they are linguistically and chronologically even further remote from the Pali than the Sanskrit versions are.

1 : The Snake Chapter (Uraga Vagga)

1:1 The Snake

Alternative versions of this poem—a Sanskrit version included in the Udānavarga, and a Gāndhārī version included in the Gāndhārī Dharmapada —have many of the same verses included here, but arranged in a different order. This suggests that the verses originally may have been separate poems, spoken on separate occasions, and that they were gathered together because they share the same refrain.

The monk who subdues his arisen anger as, with herbs, snake-venom once it has spread,
  sloughs off the near shore & far—
  as a snake, its decrepit old skin.

The monk who has cut off passion
without leaving a trace,
as he would, plunging into a lake, a lotus,
  sloughs off the near shore & far—
  as a snake, its decrepit old skin.

The monk who has cut off craving
without leaving a trace, drying up the swift-flowing flood,[1]
  sloughs off the near shore & far—
  as a snake, its decrepit old skin.

The monk who has uprooted conceit
without leaving a trace,
as a great flood, a very weak bridge made of reeds,
  sloughs off the near shore & far—
  as a snake, its decrepit old skin.

The monk seeing

in states of becoming
no essence,
as he would,
when examining fig trees,
no flowers,
    sloughs off the near shore & far—
    as a snake, its decrepit old skin.

The monk with no inner anger, who has thus gone beyond becoming & not-,
    sloughs off the near shore & far—
    as a snake, its decrepit old skin.

The monk whose discursive thoughts are dispersed, well-dealt with inside
without leaving a trace,
    sloughs off the near shore & far—
    as a snake, its decrepit old skin.

The monk who hasn't slipped past or held back,[2] transcending all this objectification,[3]
    sloughs off the near shore & far—
    as a snake, its decrepit old skin.

The monk who hasn't slipped past or held back, knowing with regard to the world that "All this is unreal,"
    sloughs off the near shore & far—
    as a snake, its decrepit old skin.

The monk who hasn't slipped past or held back, without greed, as "All this is unreal,"
    sloughs off the near shore & far—
    as a snake, its decrepit old skin.

The monk who hasn't slipped past or held back, without aversion, as "All this is unreal,"
    sloughs off the near shore & far—
    as a snake, its decrepit old skin.

The monk who hasn't slipped past or turned back, without delusion, as "All this is unreal,"
  sloughs off the near shore & far—
  as a snake, its decrepit old skin.

The monk in whom
there are no obsessions[4]
—the roots of unskillfulness totally destroyed—
  sloughs off the near shore & far—
  as a snake, its decrepit old skin.

The monk in whom
there's nothing born of disturbance[5]
that would lead him back to this shore,
  sloughs off the near shore & far—
  as a snake, its decrepit old skin.

The monk in whom
there's nothing born of the underbrush[6] that would act as a cause for binding him to becoming,
  sloughs off the near shore & far—
  as a snake, its decrepit old skin.

The monk who's abandoned five hindrances, who, untroubled, de-arrowed,[7]
has crossed over doubt,
  sloughs off the near shore & far—
  as a snake, its decrepit old skin.

3. On objectification, see Sn 4:11, note 4, and the introduction to MN 18.

4. The seven obsessions, listed in AN 7:11, are: sensual passion, resistance, views, uncertainty, conceit, passion for becoming, and ignorance. The relationship of three of these obsessions—the first two and the last—to the three types of feeling is discussed in MN 44.

6. Underbrush stands for desire. See Dhp 344.

7. The arrow can stand for becoming, craving, or grief. See SN 36:6, Sn 3:8, Sn 4:15, Dhp 351, Thag 6:13, Thig 3:5, and Thig 6:1.

1:2 Dhaniya the Cattleman

Dhaniya the cattleman:[1]

"The rice is cooked,
my milking done.
I live with my people
along the banks of the Mahi;
my hut is roofed, my fire lit:
So if you want, rain-god,
go ahead & rain."

The Buddha:

"Free from anger,
my rigidity gone,[2]
I live for one night
along the banks of the Mahi;
my hut's roof is open, my fire out.[3]
So if you want, rain-god,
go ahead & rain."

Dhaniya:

"No mosquitoes or gadflies are to be found.
The cows range in the marshy meadow where the grasses flourish.
They could stand the rain if it came:
So if you want, rain-god,
go ahead & rain."

The Buddha:

"A raft, well-made,
has been lashed together.[4] Having crossed over,
gone to the far shore,

I've subdued the flood.
No need for a raft
is to be found[5]:
So if you want, rain-god,
go ahead & rain."

Dhaniya:

"My wife is composed, not wanton, is charming, has lived with me long.
I hear no evil about her at all:
So if you want, rain-god,
go ahead & rain."

The Buddha:

"My mind is composed, released,
has long been nurtured, well tamed.
No evil is to be found in me:
So if you want, rain-god,
go ahead & rain."

Dhaniya:

"I support myself on my earnings.
My sons live in harmony,
free from disease.
I hear no evil about them at all:
So if you want, rain-god,
go ahead & rain."

The Buddha:

"I'm in no one's employ,[6]
I wander the whole world on the reward [of my Awakening].
No need for earnings
is to be found:
So if you want, rain-god,
go ahead & rain."

Dhaniya:

"There are cows, young bulls, cows in calf, & breeding cows, & a great bull, the leader of the herd:

So if you want, rain-god,
go ahead & rain."

The Buddha:

"There are no cows, no young bulls,
no cows in calf or breeding cows, no great bull, the leader of the herd[7]:
So if you want, rain-god,
go ahead & rain."

Dhaniya:

"The stakes are dug-in, immovable.
The new muñja-grass halters, well-woven, not even young bulls could break:
So if you want, rain-god,
go ahead & rain."

The Buddha:

"Having broken my bonds
like a great bull,
like a great elephant
tearing a rotting vine,[8]
I never again
will lie in the womb:
So if you want, rain-god,
go ahead & rain."[9]

The great cloud rained down
straightaway,
filling the lowlands & high.
Hearing the rain-god pour down, Dhaniya said:

"How great our gain
that we've gazed
on the Blessed One!
We go to him,

the One with Eyes,[10]
for refuge.
May you be our teacher, Great Sage.
My wife & I are composed.
Let's follow the holy life under the One Well-Gone.
Gone to the far shore
of aging & death,
let's put an end
to suffering & stress."

Māra:[11]

"Those with children
delight
because of their children.
Those with cattle
delight
because of their cows.
A person's delight
comes from acquisitions,
for a person with no acquisitions doesn't delight."

The Buddha:

"Those with children
grieve
precisely because of their children.
Those with cattle
grieve
precisely because of their cows.
A person's grief
comes from acquisitions,
for a person with no acquisitions
doesn't grieve."[12]

vv.18–34

Notes

1. Dhaniya Gopa: literally, One Whose Wealth is in Cattle. According to SnA, his herd consisted of 30,000 head of cattle.

2. The first line in the Buddha's verse plays on words in the first line of Dhaniya's. "Free from anger" (akkodhano) plays on "rice is cooked" (pakkodano); and "rigidity" (khilo) plays on "milk" (khīro).

3. "Open" means having a mind not covered or concealed by craving, defilement, or ignorance. This image is also used at Ud 5:5 and Sn 4:4. "My fire out" refers to the fires of passion, aversion, & delusion; birth, aging, & death; sorrow, lamentation, pain, distress, & despair. See SN 35:28; Iti 93; and The Mind Like Fire Unbound.

4. The raft stands for the noble eightfold path. See MN 22 and SN 35:197.

5. As this verse doesn't seem to be a direct response to the preceding one, SnA suggests that we are missing part of the conversation here. An alternative possibility is that the Buddha is engaging in word play—the word "crossed over" (tiṇṇa) being a pun on Dhaniya's reference to grass (tiṇa).

6. According to SnA, the Buddha is not in anyone else's employ nor even in his own employ—i.e., he is not in the employ of craving.

7. The Buddha may be speaking literally here—he has no cattle, so there is no way that a heavy rain could cause him harm—but he may also be speaking metaphorically. See SN 4:19 and Thag 1:1.

8. See MN 66.

9. This verse is quoted in the Milinda Pañhā.

10. On the theme of the Buddha as "One with Eyes," see DN 16, note 44. See also, Sn 2:12, note 2.

11. According to SnA, Māra suddenly comes on the scene to try—unsuccessfully—to prevent Dhaniya and his wife from going forth. His verses here, together with the Buddha's response, are also found at SN 4:8.

12. See Sn 3:12, note 2.

1:3 A Rhinoceros

The refrain in this sutta is a subject of controversy. The text literally says, "Wander alone like a 'sword-horn,' which is the Pali term for rhinoceros. SnA, however, insists that this refers not to the animal but to its horn, because the Indian rhinoceros, unlike the African, has only one horn. Still, some scholars have noted that while the Indian rhinoceros is a solitary animal, rhinoceros horns don't wander, and that in other verses in the Pali Canon, the phrase "wander alone like…" takes a person or an animal, not an animal part, for its object. Thus, for example, in Dhp 329 (repeated below), one is told to "wander alone like a king renouncing his kingdom, like the elephant in the Mataṅga woods, his herd." It's possible that the rhinoceros was chosen here as an example of solitary wandering both because of its habits and because of its unusual single horn. However, in a translation, it's necessary to choose one reading over the other. Thus, because wandering "like a rhinoceros" sounds more natural than wandering "like a horn," I have chosen the former rendering. Keep in mind, though, that the singularity of the rhinoceros horn reinforces the image.

Other versions of this poem exist in Sanskrit: a short Sanskrit version in the Mahāvastu, and a Gāndhārī version in a manuscript discovered in Central Asia. The Gāndhārī version contains many of the same verses given here, but in a different order. The Mahāvastu version contains only 12 verses, but it is followed by a statement that the full version of the sutta contained 500 verses. How that number was achieved is suggested by the fact that, of the 12 verses, several contain only minor variations from one another. All of this suggests that the verses here originally may have been separate poems, composed on separate occasions, and that they were gathered together because of their common refrain.

Like the Pārānaya Vagga, this poem is given a detailed interpretation in Nd II. Nd II ends its discussion of this sutta by saying that it was spoken by a Private Buddha, i.e., one who gains awakening on his own but is unable to formulate the Dhamma in such a way as to teach others to gain awakening. This assertion, however, is contradicted by the content of some of the verses, such as the one beginning, "Consort with one who is learned, who maintains the Dhamma, a great & quick-witted friend." Such a friend would not have existed in the time of a Private Buddha.

There is evidence suggesting that in the centuries after the rule of King Asoka, monastery-dwelling monks began to look askance at forest-dwelling monks, and in some cases even forbade them from entering the precincts around the stupas of their monasteries. Because Nd I and Nd II were most likely composed by monastery-dwelling monks, it might be the case that they tried to blunt the message of this sutta by attributing it to a Private Buddha rather than to our Buddha, the implication being that its advice was not appropriate for monks of their day and age.

Renouncing violence
for all living beings,
harming not even one of them,
you would not wish for offspring,
  so how a companion?
Wander alone[1]
like a rhinoceros.

For a person by nature entangled
there are affections;
on the heels of affection, this pain.
Seeing the drawback born of affection,
wander alone
like a rhinoceros.

One whose mind
is enmeshed in sympathy for friends & companions, neglects the goal.
Seeing this danger in intimacy,
wander alone
like a rhinoceros.

Like spreading bamboo,
  entwined,
is concern for offspring & spouses.
Like a bamboo sprout, unentangling,

wander alone
like a rhinoceros.

As a deer in the wilds, unfettered,[2]
goes for forage wherever it wants:
The observant person, valuing freedom, wanders alone
like a rhinoceros.

In the midst of companions
—when staying at home, when going out wandering—
you are prey to requests.
Valuing the freedom
that no one else covets,
wander alone
like a rhinoceros.

There is sporting & love
in the midst of companions, & abundant love for offspring.
    Feeling disgust
at the prospect of parting from those who'd be dear,
wander alone
like a rhinoceros.

Without resistance in all four directions, content with whatever you get,
enduring troubles without panic,
wander alone
like a rhinoceros.

They are hard to please,
some of those gone forth,
as well as those living the household life.
Being unconcerned
with the offspring of others,
wander alone

like a rhinoceros.

Cutting off the householder's marks,[3] like a kovilara tree
    that has shed its leaves,
the enlightened one, cutting all household ties,
wanders alone
like a rhinoceros.

If you gain an astute companion,
a fellow traveler, right-living, enlightened,
overcoming all troubles,
        go with him, gratified,
        mindful.

If you don't gain an astute companion,
a fellow traveler, right-living & wise,
        wander alone
like a king renouncing his kingdom,
like the elephant in the Mataṅga wilds,
        [his herd].[4]

We praise companionship
    —yes!
Those on a par, or better, should be chosen as friends.
If they're not to be found,
    living faultlessly,
wander alone
like a rhinoceros.

Seeing radiant bracelets of gold,
well-made by a smith,
    clinking, clashing,
    two on an arm,
wander alone
like a rhinoceros,

[Thinking:]
"In the same way,
if I were to live with another,

there would be conversation or attachment." Seeing this future danger,
wander alone
like a rhinoceros.

Because sensual pleasures, elegant, honeyed, & charming, bewitch the mind with their manifold forms—seeing this drawback in sensual strings[5]—
wander alone
like a rhinoceros.

"Calamity, tumor, misfortune, disease, an arrow, a danger for me."
Seeing this danger in sensual strings,
wander alone
like a rhinoceros.

Cold & heat, hunger & thirst, wind & sun, horseflies & snakes:
Enduring all these, without exception,
wander alone
like a rhinoceros.

As a great white elephant, with massive shoulders,
renouncing his herd,
lives in the wilds wherever he wants,
wander alone
like a rhinoceros.

"There's no way
that one delighting in company can touch even momentary release."[6] Heeding the words of the Kinsman of the Sun,[7]
wander alone
like a rhinoceros.

Transcending the contortion of views,[8]

the sure way attained,
the path gained,
[realizing:]
"Unled by others,
I have knowledge arisen,"
wander alone
like a rhinoceros.

With no greed, no deceit, no thirst, no hypocrisy—delusion & blemishes blown away—
with no inclinations for all the world,
every world,
wander alone
like a rhinoceros.

Avoid the evil companion disregarding the goal, intent on the discordant[2] way.
Don't associate yourself with someone heedless & hankering.
Wander alone
like a rhinoceros.

Consort with one who is learned,
who maintains the Dhamma,
a great & quick-witted friend.
Knowing the meanings,
subdue your perplexity, [then] wander alone
like a rhinoceros.

Free from longing, finding no pleasure in the world's sport, ardor, or sensual bliss, abstaining from adornment,
speaking the truth,
wander alone
like a rhinoceros.

Abandoning offspring, spouse, father, mother,
riches, grain, relatives, & sensual pleasures
    altogether,
wander alone
like a rhinoceros.

    "This is a bondage.
There's little happiness here,
next to no enjoyment,
all the more suffering & pain.[10]
    This is a boil"[11]:
Knowing this, circumspect,
wander alone
like a rhinoceros.

Shattering fetters,
like a fish in the water tearing a net,
like a fire not coming back to what's burnt,
wander alone
like a rhinoceros.

Eyes downcast, not footloose, senses guarded, with protected mind, not soggy, not burning,[12]
wander alone
like a rhinoceros.

Taking off the householder's marks,[13] like a coral tree
    that has shed its leaves,
going forth in the ochre robe,
wander alone
like a rhinoceros.

Showing no greed for flavors, not wanton, going from house to house for alms with mind unenmeshed in this family or that,
wander alone

like a rhinoceros.

Abandoning barriers to awareness, expelling all defilements—all—non-dependent, cutting aversion, affection,
wander alone
like a rhinoceros.

Turning your back on pleasure & pain,
as earlier with sorrow & joy, attaining pure
equanimity,
tranquility,[14]
wander alone
like a rhinoceros.

With persistence aroused for the highest goal's attainment, with mind unsmeared, not lazy in action, firm in effort, with steadfastness & strength arisen,
wander alone
like a rhinoceros.

Not neglecting seclusion, jhāna, constantly living the Dhamma
in line with the Dhamma, comprehending the danger
in states of becoming,
wander alone
like a rhinoceros.

Intent on the ending of craving & heedful, neither drooling nor dumb,
but learned, mindful,
—having reckoned the Dhamma—certain & striving,
wander alone
like a rhinoceros.

Unstartled, like a lion at sounds.

Unsnared, like the wind in a net.
Unsmeared, like a lotus in water[15]:
Wander alone
like a rhinoceros.

Like a lion—forceful, strong in fang, living as a conqueror, the king of beasts—resort to a solitary dwelling.
Wander alone
like a rhinoceros.

At the right time consorting with the release through goodwill, compassion,
  empathetic joy,
  equanimity,
unobstructed by all the world,
  any world,
wander alone
like a rhinoceros.

Having let go of passion,
  aversion,
  delusion;
having shattered the fetters;
unfazed at the ending of life,
wander alone
like a rhinoceros.

People follow & associate for a motive.
Friends without a motive these days
  are rare.
They're shrewd for their own ends, & impure.
  Wander alone
like a rhinoceros.

vv. 35–75

Notes

1. Nd II details the various ways in which a Private Buddha can be said to wander alone (eko). Two of the ways have to do with physical seclusion: He goes forth alone and wanders without a companion. The remaining have to do with mental seclusion: He has abandoned craving; is free of passion, aversion, and delusion; and has followed the path going one way only (ekāyanamagga). Interestingly enough, Nd II defines this path, not as just the four establishings of mindfulness (see DN 22) but as all seven sets of dhammas in the Wings to Awakening.

Nd II illustrates its reference to the abandoning of craving as a type of seclusion with this verse from Iti 15:

> With craving his companion, a man
> wanders on a long, long time.
> Neither in this state here
> nor anywhere else
> does he go beyond
> the wandering-on.
> Knowing this drawback—
> that craving brings stress into play—
> free from craving,
> devoid of clinging,
> mindful, the monk
> lives the mendicant life.

Nd II illustrates its reference to the path going one way only with this verse from SN 47:18 and SN 47:43:

> One with vision of the ending of birth, > sympathetic to welfare, > discerns the path going one way only,
> by which, in the past, they crossed over,
> are now crossing over,
> and will cross over > the flood.

2. SN 35:191 lists two fetters: desire and passion. AN 10:13 lists ten: self-identification views, uncertainty, grasping at habits & practices, sensual desire, ill will, passion for form, passion for what is formless, conceit, restlessness, and ignorance.

3. Hair and beard.

4. These verses = Dhp 328–329.

5. "There are these five strings of sensuality. Which five? Forms cognizable via the eye—agreeable, pleasing, charming, endearing, enticing, linked with sensual desire; sounds cognizable via the ear… aromas cognizable via the nose… flavors cognizable via the tongue… tactile sensations cognizable via the body—agreeable, pleasing, charming, endearing, enticing, linked with sensual desire. But these are not sensuality. They are called strings of sensuality in the discipline of the noble ones." — AN 6:63

6. The temporary release from such things as the hindrances, attained when entering right concentration, or the temporary release from some of the factors of lower states of jhāna, attained when entering higher states of jhāna. This release lasts only as long as the necessary causal factors are still in place. This is apparently the same thing as the occasional release/liberation mentioned in MN 29. See note 2 to that sutta.

7. An epithet for the Buddha.

8. According to Nd II, the views here are the 20 forms of identity-views (see SN 22:1) and the 62 views discussed in DN 1. (The connection between these two lists is discussed in SN 41:3.) MN 2, however, explains a "contortion of views" in different terms, which may have been intended here.

9. Visama. See Sn 1:12, note 11.

10. See MN 54.

11. Reading gaṇḍo with the Thai editions. The other editions have gaḷo, fishhook. See AN 9:15.

12. Nd II explains "not soggy" by quoting Ven. Mahā Moggallāna's words in SN 35:202. The central part of the passage is this: "And how is one soggy? There is the case where a monk, when seeing a form via the eye, is, in the case of pleasing forms, committed to forms and, in the case of displeasing forms, afflicted by forms. He remains with body-mindfulness not present, and with limited awareness. And he does not discern, as it has come to be, the awareness-release & discernment-release where those evil, unskillful qualities that have arisen cease without trace. [Similarly with the remaining sense media.] …

"And how is one not soggy? There is the case where a monk, when seeing a form via the eye, is not, in the case of pleasing forms, committed to forms nor, in the case of displeasing forms, afflicted by forms. He remains with body-mindfulness present, and with immeasurable awareness. And he discerns, as it has come to be, the awareness-release & discernment-release where those evil, unskillful qualities that have arisen cease without trace. [Similarly with the remaining sense media.]"

See also AN 3:110.

According to Nd II, "not burning" means not burning with the fires of passion, aversion, and delusion. See SN 35:28 and Iti 93.

13. Lay clothing.

14. This is a reference to the fourth jhāna. See MN 119.

15. These lines are repeated at Sn 1:12.

1:4 To Kasi Bhāradvāja

This sutta is nearly identical with SN 7:11—"nearly," because the incident reported here of Kasi's throwing away the milk-rice, and its sizzling in the water, is not included in that version.

I have heard that on one occasion the Blessed One was staying among the Magadhans in Dakkhiṇāgiri near the brahman village of Ekanāḷā. Now at that time approximately 500 of the brahman Kasi [Plowing] Bhāradvāja's plows were yoked at the sowing time. Then, in the early morning, after adjusting his lower robe and carrying his bowl & outer robe, the Blessed One went to where Kasi Bhāradvāja was working. Now at that time Kasi Bhāradvāja's food-distribution was underway. So the Blessed One went to Kasi Bhāradvāja's food-distribution and, on arrival, stood to one side. Kasi Bhāradvāja saw the Blessed One standing for alms, and on seeing him, said to him, "I, contemplative, plow & sow. Having plowed & sown, I eat. You, too, contemplative, should plow & sow. Having plowed & sown, you (will) eat."

"I, too, brahman, plow & sow. Having plowed & sown, I eat."

"But, contemplative, we don't see the Master Gotama's yoke or plow, plowshare, goad, or oxen, and yet the Master Gotama says this: 'I, too, brahman, plow & sow. Having plowed & sown, I eat.'"

Then Kasi Bhāradvāja addressed the Blessed One with a verse:

> You claim to be a plowman,
> but we don't see your plowing.
> Being asked, tell us about your plowing > so that we may know your plowing.

The Buddha:

> Conviction's my seed,
> austerity my rain,
> discernment my yoke & plow,

shame my pole,
mind my yoke-tie,
mindfulness my plowshare & goad.

Guarded in body,
guarded in speech,
restrained in terms of belly & food,
  I make truth a weeding-hook, and composure my unyoking.
Persistence, my beast of burden, bearing me toward rest from the yoke, takes me, without turning back,
  to where, having gone,
  one doesn't grieve.
That's how my plowing is plowed.
  It has
  as its fruit
  the deathless.
Having plowed this plowing, one is unyoked
  from all suffering
  & stress.

Then Kasi Bhāradvāja, having heaped up milk-rice in a large bronze serving bowl, offered it to the Blessed One, [saying,] "May Master Gotama eat [this] milk-rice. The master is a plowman, for the Master Gotama plows the plowing that has as its fruit the deathless."

The Buddha:

What's been chanted over with verses
shouldn't be eaten by me.
That's not the nature, brahman,
of one who's seen rightly.
What's been chanted over with verses
Awakened Ones reject.
  That being their Dhamma, brahman,
  this is their way of life.
Serve with other food & drink

a fully-perfected great seer,
his effluents ended,
his anxiety stilled,
for that is the field
for one looking for merit.

"Then to whom, Master Gotama, should I give this milk-rice?"

"Brahman, I don't see that person in this world—with its devas, Māras, & Brahmās, in this generation with its contemplatives & brahmans, its royalty & commonfolk—by whom this milk-rice, having been eaten, would be rightly digested, aside from a Tathāgata or a Tathāgata's disciple. In that case, brahman, throw the milk-rice away in a place without vegetation, or dump it in water with no living beings."

So Kasi Bhāradvāja dumped the milk-rice in water with no living beings. And the milk-rice, when dropped in the water, hissed & sizzled, seethed & steamed. Just as an iron ball heated all day, when tossed in the water, hisses & sizzles, seethes & steams, in the same way the milk-rice, when dropped in the water, hissed & sizzled, seethed & steamed.

Then Kasi Bhāradvāja—in awe, his hair standing on end—went to the Blessed One and, on arrival, throwing himself down with his head at the Blessed One's feet, said to him, "Magnificent, Master Gotama! Magnificent! Just as if he were to place upright what was overturned, to reveal what was hidden, to show the way to one who was lost, or to carry a lamp into the dark so that those with eyes could see forms, in the same way has Master Gotama—through many lines of reasoning—made the Dhamma clear. I go to Master Gotama for refuge, to the Dhamma, & to the Saṅgha of monks. May Master Gotama remember me as a lay follower who has gone for refuge from this day forward, for life. Let me obtain the Going-forth in Master Gotama's presence, let me obtain Acceptance (into the Bhikkhu Saṅgha)."

Then the brahman Kasi Bhāradvāja obtained the Going-forth in the Blessed One's presence, he obtained Acceptance. And not long after his Acceptance—dwelling alone, secluded, heedful, ardent, & resolute—he in no long time reached & remained in the supreme goal of the holy life, for which clansmen rightly go forth from home into homelessness, knowing & realizing it for himself in the here-&-now. He knew: "Birth is ended, the holy life fulfilled, the task done. There is nothing further for the sake of this world." And so Ven. Bhāradvāja became another one of the arahants.

1:5 Cunda

Cunda the smith:

I ask the sage of abundant discernment, awakened, lord of the Dhamma, free
of craving,
    supreme
among two-legged beings, best
of charioteers:
    How many contemplatives are there in the world?
        Please tell me.

The Buddha:

Four contemplatives, there is no fifth.
Being asked in person, I disclose them to you:
    the path-victor, the path-explainer,
    one who lives by the path,
    and the path-corrupter.

Cunda:

Whom do the awakened call
the path-victor?
How is one unequaled
in pointing out the path?
When asked, tell me about the one who lives by the path.
Then disclose the path-corrupter to me.

The Buddha:

Whoever, de-arrowed,
has crossed over doubt,
is refreshed in unbinding, devoid of greed,

a guide to the world along with its devas:
The awakened call such a person path-victor.

Whoever here knowing
the foremost as foremost,
who points out,
who analyzes the Dhamma right here,
he, the cutter of doubt, the sage unperturbed, is called the second of monks:
    path-explainer.

Whoever lives by the path,
the Dhamma-way well-explained, restrained, mindful,
partaking of blameless ways,
is called the third of monks:
    with the path as his life.

Making a façade of good practices, brash, reckless, a corrupter of families,[1] idle, deceitful, unrestrained, & going about as a counterfeit:
    He is a path-corrupter.

And when any householder
    —an instructed disciple of the noble ones, discerning—
understands these,
knowing, "Not all are like that one,"[2] seeing one like that doesn't kill his conviction.
For how would one equate
the corrupt   with the uncorrupt, the impure   with the pure?

vv. 83–90

Notes

1. A corrupter of families is a monk who ingratiates himself into a family's affections by performing services for them that are inappropriate for a monk to do, thus diverting their faith away from those who live by the Dhamma and Vinaya. For more on this term, see The Buddhist Monastic Code, Saṅghādisesa 13.

2. "That one" = the path-corrupter.

1:6 Decline

I have heard that at one time the Blessed One was staying near Sāvatthī in Jeta's Grove, Anāthapiṇḍika's monastery. Then a certain deva, in the far extreme of the night, her extreme radiance lighting up the entirety of Jeta's Grove, went to the Blessed One. On arrival, having bowed down to him, she stood to one side. As she was standing there, she addressed him with a verse:

About the man in decline
we ask Gotama,
having come to question the Blessed One:
What is the way leading to decline?

The Buddha:

Easily known is the one of good prospects;
easily known,[1] the one in decline.
The one of good prospects loves the Dhamma,
the one in decline
detests it.

The deva:

We know, indeed, that that is so.
That's the first one in decline.
May the Blessed One tell the second:
What is the way leading to decline?

The Buddha:

The wicked are dear to him,
the good he doesn't hold dear.
He approves of the ideas of the wicked:
That is the way leading to decline.

The deva:

We know, indeed, that that is so.
That's the second one in decline.
May the Blessed One tell the third:
What is the way leading to decline?

The Buddha:

Prone to sleep, prone to company,
the man with no initiative,
lazy & known for his anger:
That is the way leading to decline.

The deva:

We know, indeed, that that is so.
That's the third one in decline.
May the Blessed One tell the fourth:
What is the way leading to decline?

The Buddha:

Though capable, one doesn't support one's mother or father
—old, their youth over & done:
That is the way leading to decline.

The deva:

We know, indeed, that that is so.
That's the fourth one in decline.
May the Blessed One tell the fifth:
What is the way leading to decline?

The Buddha:

Whoever deceives with a lie
a brahman, contemplative,
or other mendicant:
That is the way leading to decline.

The deva:

We know, indeed, that that is so.
That's the fifth one in decline.
May the Blessed One tell the sixth:
What is the way leading to decline?

The Buddha:

The man of great wealth,
with gold & food,
enjoys his luxuries alone:
    That is the way leading to decline.

The deva:

We know, indeed, that that is so.
That's the sixth one in decline.
May the Blessed One tell the seventh:
What is the way leading to decline?

The Buddha:

The man proud of his birth, proud of his wealth,
proud of his clan,
despises his own relatives:
    That is the way leading to decline.

The deva:

We know, indeed, that that is so.
That's the seventh one in decline.
May the Blessed One tell the eighth:
What is the way leading to decline?

The Buddha:

The man debauched with women,
debauched in drink,
debauched in gambling,
squanders his earnings:
    That is the way leading to decline.

The deva:

We know, indeed, that that is so.
That's the eighth one in decline.
May the Blessed One tell the ninth:
What is the way leading to decline?

The Buddha:

One uncontent with his own wives, misbehaves with prostitutes & the wives of others[2]:

That is the way leading to decline.

The deva:

We know, indeed, that that is so.
That's the ninth one in decline.
May the Blessed One tell the tenth:
What is the way leading to decline?

The Buddha:

His youth past,
a man takes a young woman with timbara-fruit breasts, and, jealous of her, doesn't sleep:
That is the way leading to decline.

The deva:

We know, indeed, that that is so.
That's the tenth one in decline.
May the Blessed One tell the eleventh:
What is the way leading to decline?

The Buddha:

To place in authority
a woman given to drink & squandering or a man of that sort:
That is the way leading to decline.

The deva:

We know, indeed, that that is so.
That's the eleventh one in decline.
May the Blessed One tell the twelfth:
What is the way leading to decline?

The Buddha:

One of meager means
but great craving,
born into a noble family,
who aspires to kingship:

That is the way leading to decline.

Contemplating
these ones in decline
in the world,
the wise one,
consummate in noble view, heads to a world
auspicious.

vv. 91–115

Notes

1. Suvijāno. The Thai edition reads, duvijāno, "hard to know," which doesn't fit with the meaning or with SnA's explanation of the verse.

2. Reading padussati and dussati with the Thai edition. The PTS and Sri Lankan editions read padissati/dissati, "he is seen."

1:7 An Outcaste

I have heard that on one occasion the Blessed One was staying near Sāvatthī in Jeta's Grove, Anāthapiṇḍika's monastery. Then, in the early morning, after adjusting his lower robe and carrying his bowl & outer robe, he entered Sāvatthī for alms. Now at that time, in the house of the brahman Aggika Bhāradvāja, a (sacrificial) fire was burning and an offering was lifted up. Then the Blessed One, going through Sāvatthī on a methodical almsround,[1] approached the house of Aggika Bhāradvāja. Aggika Bhāradvāja saw the Blessed One coming from afar and, on seeing him, said to him: "Stop right there, you little shaveling! Right there, you little contemplative! Right there, you little outcaste!"

When this was said, the Blessed One said to the brahman Aggika Bhāradvāja, "But do you know, brahman, what an outcaste is, or the actions that make one an outcaste?"

"No, in fact, Master Gotama, I don't know what an outcaste is, or the actions that make one an outcaste. It would be good if Master Gotama taught me the Dhamma so that I would know what an outcaste is and the actions that make one an outcaste."

"In that case, brahman, listen and pay close attention. I will speak."

"As you say, master," the brahman Aggika Bhāradvāja responded to the Blessed One.

The Blessed One said:

> Whatever man is angry, resentful,
> evil, merciless,
> deceitful, and defective in his views:
> He should be known as 'outcaste.'
>
> Whoever here harms a living being > once-born or twice-born,[2] > who has no sympathy for a living being:

He should be known as ‘outcaste.’

Whoever destroys or besieges villages or towns,
a notorious oppressor:
He should be known as ‘outcaste.’

Whoever, from village or wilderness, takes in a manner of theft what others claim as ‘mine’:
He should be known as ‘outcaste.’

Whoever, actually incurring a debt, when pressed to pay, evades, (saying,) ‘I’m in no debt to you’:
He should be known as ‘outcaste.’

Whoever, desiring whatever-the-thing, strikes a person going along a road,
to take whatever-the-thing:
He should be known as ‘outcaste.’

Whatever man, for his own sake,
the sake of another,
or the sake of wealth,
tells a lie when asked to bear witness:
He should be known as ‘outcaste.’

Whoever misbehaves
with the wives of relatives or friends, by force or with their consent:
He should be known as ‘outcaste.’

Whoever, though capable, doesn’t support his mother or father
—old, their youth over & done:
He should be known as ‘outcaste.’

Whoever strikes and reviles with his speech mother or father,
sister or brother,

or mother-in-law:
He should be known as 'outcaste.'

Whoever, asked about what's beneficial, teaches what's not
and gives counsel concealing some points:
He should be known as 'outcaste.'

Whoever, doing an evil deed, wishes, 'May I not be known,' acting in hiding:
He should be known as 'outcaste.'

Whoever, having gone to another's house, being offered pure food, doesn't honor (the host) in return when he comes (to one's house):
He should be known as 'outcaste.'

Whoever deceives with a lie
a brahman, contemplative,
or other mendicant:
He should be known as 'outcaste.'

Whoever, when a brahman or contemplative appears at mealtime, reviles him with speech and doesn't give:
He should be known as 'outcaste.'[3]

Whoever, wrapped in delusion, speaks here what is untrue, greedy for whatever-the-thing:
He should be known as 'outcaste.'

Whoever exalts himself and disparages others,[4] debased by his own pride:
He should be known as 'outcaste.'

Angry, mean, evil in his desires, miserly, dishonest,
devoid of shame & compunction:

He should be known as 'outcaste.'

Whoever heaps verbal abuse on an Awakened One or his disciple,
wanderer or householder:
He should be known as 'outcaste.'

Whoever, though not an arahant, claims to be an arahant:
He is the thief in this world with its Brahmās.[5]
He is the vilest of outcastes.

These are said to be outcastes, as I have proclaimed them to you.
Not by birth is one an outcaste,
not by birth a brahman.
By action one is an outcaste.
By action is one a brahman.[6]

Know, too, by this,
as I give an example:
Sopāka, the son of an outcaste,
was well-known as Mātaṅga:
He, Mātaṅga,
attained the highest prestige,
hard to gain.
They came into his service,
many noble warriors & brahmans.
Mounting the divine chariot,[7]
and the great, stainless road, dispassioned for sensual passion,
he reached the world of the Brahmās.
His birth didn't prevent him from reaching the world of the Brahmās.

Though born into a family of scholars,
brahmans, with chants as their kinsmen,
are repeatedly seen with evil deeds:
blameworthy in the here-&-now,

with a bad destination in the afterlife.
  Their birth doesn't prevent them
  from blame & a bad destination.

Not by birth is one an outcaste,
  not by birth a brahman.
By action one is an outcaste.
  By action is one a brahman.

When this was said, the brahman Aggika Bhāradvāja said to the Blessed One: "Magnificent, Master Gotama! Magnificent! Just as if he were to place upright what was overturned, to reveal what was hidden, to show the way to one who was lost, or to carry a lamp into the dark so that those with eyes could see forms, in the same way has Master Gotama—through many lines of reasoning—made the Dhamma clear. I go to Master Gotama for refuge, to the Dhamma, & to the Saṅgha of monks. May Master Gotama remember me as a lay follower who has gone for refuge from this day forward, for life."

vv. 116–142

Notes

1. The practice of not bypassing any donors on one's almsround, one of the thirteen ascetic (dhutaṅga) practices. See Thag 16:7.

2. Birds and reptiles count as "twice-born" in that the laying of an egg is the first birth, and the emergence of the chick or baby reptile from the egg is the second.

3. This, of course, is a comment on what Aggika Bhāradvāja has just done.

4. See AN 4:28 and AN 5:159.

5. The Vibhaṅga to Pārājika 4 states that those who make false claims to superior human attainments—meaning the four jhānas and the noble attainments—are the greatest thieves in the world in that they consume the almsfood of the countryside by theft.

6. See Sn 3:9.

7. SnA: The divine chariot stands for the eight concentration attainments: the four jhānas and the four formless states.

1:8 Goodwill

(This sutta is identical with Khp 9.)

This is to be done by one skilled in aims appreciating the state of peace:
Be capable, upright, & straightforward,
easy to instruct, gentle, & not conceited,
content & easy to support,
with few duties, living lightly,
with peaceful faculties, astute,
modest, & no greed for supporters.

Do not do the slightest thing
that the observant would later censure.

Think: Happy, at rest,
may all beings be happy at heart.
Whatever beings there may be,
weak or strong, without exception,
long, large,
middling, short,
subtle, gross,
seen & unseen,
living near & far away,
born or seeking birth:
May all beings be happy at heart.
Let no one deceive another
or despise anyone anywhere,
or, through anger or resistance-perception,
wish for another to suffer.

As a mother would risk her life
to protect her child, her only child,
even so should one cultivate the heart limitlessly

with regard to all beings.[1]
With goodwill for the entire cosmos,
cultivate the heart limitlessly:
above, below, & all around,
unobstructed, without hostility or hate.
Whether standing, walking,
sitting, or lying down,
    as long as one has banished torpor,
one should be determined on this mindfulness.[2]
This is called a Brahmā abiding
                here.

Not taken with views,
but virtuous & consummate in vision,
having subdued greed for sensuality,
    one never again
    will lie in the womb.

vv. 143–152

Notes

1. The image here is sometimes misconstrued as saying that one should protect all beings as a mother would protect her only child. Actually, the parallel is not between the child and all living beings; it is between the child and one's cultivation of the heart: One should protect one's goodwill toward all beings in the same way that a mother would protect her only child. On this point, see MN 21.

2. This line has to be read in line with the Buddha's definition of mindfulness as the ability to keep something in mind. See SN 48:10.

1:9 Hemavata

Sātāgira the yakkha:
Today is the fifteenth,
the uposatha day.
A divine night is at hand.
Let's go see Gotama,
the Teacher perfectly named.

Hemavata the yakkha:
Is his mind well-directed,
Such,[1] toward all beings?
Are his resolves mastered regarding what's desirable & not?

Sātāgira the yakkha:
His mind is well-directed and Such toward all beings.
And his resolves are mastered
regarding what's desirable & not.

Hemavata the yakkha:
Does he not take what's not given?
Is he restrained toward beings?
Is he far from complacency?
Does he not neglect jhāna?[2]

Sātāgira the yakkha:
He doesn't take what's not given,
and he's restrained toward beings.
He's far from complacency and,
awakened, he does not neglect jhāna.

Hemavata the yakkha:
Does he not tell lies?

Do his ways of speaking not cut things off?
Does he not speak destructively?
Does he not speak idly?[3]

Sātāgira the yakkha:

He doesn't tell lies.
His ways of speaking don't cut things off.
He doesn't speak destructively.
Deliberating, he speaks what's of benefit.

Hemavata the yakkha:

Is he not passionate for sensuality?
Is his mind unmuddied?
Has he gone beyond delusion?
Does he have an Eye
with regard to phenomena?

Sātāgira the yakkha:

He's not passionate for sensuality.
His mind is unmuddied.
He has gone beyond all delusion.
Awakened, he has an Eye
with regard to phenomena.

Hemavata the yakkha:

Is he consummate in clear-knowing?
Is he pure in his conduct?[4]
Are his effluents ended?
Does he have no further becoming?

Sātāgira the yakkha:

He is both consummate in clear-knowing & pure in his conduct.
All his effluents are ended.
He has no further becoming.

Hemavata the yakkha:

Consummate the mind of the sage
in action & in ways of speech, you rightly praise him

as consummate in clear-knowing & conduct.
Consummate the mind of the sage
in action & in ways of speech, you rightly rejoice in him
as consummate in clear-knowing & conduct.
Consummate the mind of the sage
in action & in ways of speech,
let's go see Gotama,
consummate in clear-knowing & conduct.
Come, let's go see Gotama,
    enlightened,
with legs like an antelope, thin, eating little, not greedy, doing jhāna in the forest.
Having gone to the nāga,[5]
the lion wandering alone, indifferent to sensuality, let's ask him
about release from Death's snare.
Let's ask Gotama, proclaimer, preacher,
attained to the far shore
of all phenomena:
    awakened,
    gone past animosity & fear.

* * *

Hemavata the yakkha:

In what has the world arisen?
In what does it make acquaintance?
From clinging to what is the world?
In what is the world
afflicted?

The Buddha:

In six has the world arisen.[6]

In six does it make acquaintance.
From clinging just to six
is the world,
in six is the world[7]
afflicted.

Hemavata the yakkha:

Which is that clinging
where the world is afflicted?
When asked the way leading out, please tell how is one released
from suffering & stress.

The Buddha:

The five strings of sensuality in the world,[8] with the heart described as the sixth:
Being dispassioned for desire there:
That's how one's released
from suffering & stress.

That is the way leading out of the world proclaimed to you as it really is,
I have proclaimed to you:
That's how one is released
from suffering & stress.

Hemavata the yakkha:

Who here crosses
over the flood?
Who here crosses
over the ocean?
Unestablished,
without support,[9]
who doesn't sink
into the deep?

The Buddha:

Always consummate in virtue, discerning, well-centered, internally percipient,[10] mindful, one crosses over the flood

hard to cross.
Abstaining from perceptions of sensuality, overcoming all fetters, having totally ended delight in becoming,
one doesn't sink
into the deep.[11]

Hemavata the yakkha:

The one deeply discerning,
seeing the subtle goal,
having nothing,
unattached in sensual becoming:
See him, everywhere released,[12]
the great seer, going the divine way!

Perfectly named,
seeing the subtle goal,
granting discernment,
unattached to sensual nostalgia:
See him, all-knowing, wise,
the great seer, going the noble way!

Truly, it was well-seen today,
well-dawned, well-arisen, that we saw the One Self-Awakened, crossed over the flood,
effluent-free.

These ten hundred yakkhas, powerful, prestigious,
all go to you for refuge.
You are our teacher unexcelled.

We will wander from village to village,
town to town,
paying homage to the One Self-Awakened & to the Dhamma's true rightness.

Notes

1. Such (tādin): An adjective applied to the mind of one who has attained the goal. It indicates that the mind "is what it is"—indescribable but not subject to change or alteration.

2. See MN 6 and AN 10:71.

3. According to SnA, these four questions deal with the four forms of wrong speech: telling lies, speaking harshly, engaging in divisive tale-bearing, and engaging in idle chatter.

4. See MN 53.

5. See AN 6:43 and Thag 15:2.

6. According to SnA, the "six" are the six internal and external sense media. See the definition of "world" in SN 35:82.

7. The phrase, "is the world," functions as a lamp here.

8. See Sn 1:3, note 5.

9. On unestablished consciousness, see Ud 8:1, SN 12:64, SN 22:87, and the discussion in The Paradox of Becoming, chapter 7.

10. Reading ajjhatta-saññī with the Thai edition. The other editions read ajjhatta-cintī, "internally thinking."

1:10 Āḷavaka

(This sutta is identical with SN 10:12.)

I have heard that on one occasion the Blessed One was staying at Āḷavī in the haunt of the Āḷavaka yakkha. Then the Āḷavaka yakkha went to the Blessed One and on arrival said to him: "Get out, contemplative!"

[Saying,] "All right, my friend," the Blessed One went out.

"Come in, contemplative!"

"All right, my friend," the Blessed One went in.

A second time.... A third time, the Āḷavaka yakkha said to the Blessed One, "Get out, contemplative!"

"All right, my friend," the Blessed One went out.

"Come in, contemplative!"

"All right, my friend," the Blessed One went in.

Then a fourth time, the Āḷavaka yakkha said to the Blessed One, "Get out, contemplative!"

"I won't go out, my friend. Do what you have to do."

"I will ask you a question, contemplative. If you can't answer me, I will hurl out your mind or rip open your heart or, grabbing you by the feet, hurl you across the Ganges."

"My friend, I see no one in the cosmos with its devas, Māras, & Brahmās, in this generation with its contemplatives & brahmans, its royalty & commonfolk, who could hurl out my mind or rip open my heart or, grabbing me by the feet, hurl me across the Ganges. But nevertheless, ask me what you wish."

Āḷavaka:

What is a person's highest wealth here?

What, when well-practiced, brings bliss?
What is the most excellent of savors?
Living in what way
is one's life called the best?

The Buddha:

Conviction is a person's highest wealth here.
Dhamma, well-practiced, brings bliss.
Truth is the most excellent of savors.[1] Living with discernment, one's life is called best.

Āḷavaka:

How does one cross over the flood?
How over the sea?
How does one overcome suffering & stress?
How is a person purified?

The Buddha:

Through conviction one crosses over the flood.
Through heedfulness, the sea.
Through persistence one overcomes suffering & stress.
Through discernment a person is purified.

Āḷavaka:

How does one gain discernment?
How does one find wealth?
How does one attain honor?
How bind friends to oneself?
Passing from this world
to
the next world,
how does one not grieve?

The Buddha:

Convinced of the arahants' Dhamma
for attaining unbinding,
—heedful, investigating—one listening well

gains discernment.
Doing what's fitting,
enduring burdens,
one with initiative
finds wealth.
Through truth
one attains honor.
Giving
binds friends to oneself.

Endowed with these four qualities,
—truth,
self-control,
stamina,
generosity—
a householder of conviction, on passing away, doesn't grieve.
Now, go ask others,
common brahmans & contemplatives,
if anything better than
truth,
self-control,
stamina,
& generosity
here can be found.

Āḷavaka:

How could I go ask
common brahmans & contemplatives?— now that today I discern what benefits
the next life.
It was truly for my well-being that the Awakened One came to stay in Āḷavī.
Today I discern where what is given
bears great fruit.

I will wander from village to village,
town to town,
paying homage to the One Self-Awakened & to the Dhamma's true rightness.

vv. 181–192

1:11 Victory

Whether walking, standing,
sitting, or lying down,
it flexes & stretches:
    This is the body's movement.
Joined together with tendons & bones, plastered over with muscle & skin, hidden by complexion,
    the body isn't seen
    for what it is:
filled with intestines, filled with stomach,
with the lump of the liver, bladder, lungs, heart,
kidneys, spleen,
mucus, sweat, saliva, fat,
blood, synovial fluid, bile, & oil.
On top of that,
in nine streams,
filth is always flowing from it—
from the eyes : eye secretions, from the ears : ear secretions,
from the nose : mucus,
from the mouth it vomits :
    now vomit,
    now phlegm,
    now bile;
from the body : beads of sweat.

And on top of that,
its hollow head is filled with brains.
The fool, beset by ignorance, thinks it beautiful,
but when it lies dead,

swollen, livid,
cast away in a charnel ground,
even relatives don't care for it.
Dogs feed on it,
jackals, wolves, & worms.
Crows & vultures feed on it, along with any other animals there.

Having heard the Awakened One's words, the discerning monk comprehends, for he sees it
for what it is:
"As this is, so is that.
As that, so this."
Within & without,
he should let desire for the body fade away.
With desire & passion faded away,
the discerning monk arrives here:
at the deathless,
the calm,
the unfallen, undying[1] state
of unbinding.

This two-footed thing is cared for,
filthy, evil-smelling,
filled with various carcasses,
oozing out here & there:
Whoever would think,
on the basis of a body like this,
to exalt himself or disparage another—What is that if not blindness?

vv. 193–206

1:12 The Sage

Danger is born from intimacy,[1] a home gives birth to dust.[2] Free from a home,
free from intimacy:
Such is the vision of the sage.[3]

Who, destroying what's born, wouldn't plant (again)
or nourish what's taking birth:
They call him the wandering, solitary sage.
He, the great seer
has seen
the state of peace.

Considering the ground,
crushing the seed,
he wouldn't nourish the sap[4]
—truly a sage—
seer of the ending of birth, abandoning conjecture,
he cannot be classified.

Knowing all dwellings,[5] not longing for any one anywhere
—truly a sage—
with no coveting, without greed, he does not build,[6]
for he has gone beyond.

Conquering all
knowing all,
wise.
With regard to all things:

unsmeared.
Abandoning all,
in the ending of craving,
released:
The enlightened call him a sage.

With discernment his strength, well-endowed in habit & practice,
centered,
delighting in jhāna,
mindful,
released from attachments,
free from rigidity, free
from effluent[7]:
The enlightened call him a sage.

The solitary wandering sage, uncomplacent, unshaken by praise or blame—
unstartled, like a lion at sounds, uncaught, like the wind in a net,
unsmeared, like a lotus in water,[8]
leader of others, by others unled:
The enlightened call him a sage.

Who becomes like the pillar at a bathing ford,[9] when others speak in extremes;
he, without passion,
his senses well-centered:
The enlightened call him a sage.

Truly poised, straight as a shuttle,[10]
he loathes evil actions.
Pondering what is consonant & discordant[11]:
The enlightened call him a sage.

Restrained in mind, he does no evil.
Young & middle-aged,
the sage self-controlled,
never angered, he angers none:

The enlightened call him a sage.

From the best
the middling
the leftovers
he receives alms.
Sustaining himself on what others give,
neither flattering
nor speaking disparagement:
The enlightened call him a sage.

The wandering sage abstaining from sex,
in youth bound by no one, abstaining from intoxication[12]
complacency,
totally apart:
The enlightened call him a sage.

Knowing the world,
seeing the highest goal, crossing the ocean,[13] the flood,[14]
—Such[15]—
his chains broken,
unattached,
without effluent:
The enlightened call him a sage.

These two are different,
they dwell far apart:
the householder supporting a wife and the unselfish one, of good practices.
Slaying other beings, the householder is unrestrained.
Constantly the sage protects other beings, is controlled.

Just as the crested,
blue-necked peacock,
when flying,

never matches
the wild goose
in speed,
    even so the householder never keeps up with the monk—the sage secluded
    in the forest,
    doing jhāna.

vv. 207–221

Notes

1. SnA: Dangers in intimacy = Craving and views.

2. SnA: Dust = Passion, aversion, and delusion.

3. This verse is quoted in the Milinda Pañhā. The poem as a whole is apparently the same as the Munigāthā mentioned in King Asoka's Calcutta-Bairāṭ edict.

4. SnA: Ground, seed, and sap = The aggregates, sense media, and properties form the ground in which grows the seed of constructive consciousness—the consciousness that develops into states of being and birth. (For other instances of this image, see SN 22:53–55.) The sap of this seed is craving and views.

5. SnA: Dwellings (nivesanāni) = States of becoming and birth. This term can also be translated as "entrenchments." See Sn 4:3, note 2.

6. SnA: He does not build = He performs none of the good or bad deeds that give rise to further states of becoming and birth. See Dhp 39, 267, and 412.

7. Effluent (āsava): Three qualities—sensual desire, states of becoming, or ignorance—that "flow out" of the mind and defile it. Sometimes a fourth quality—views—is added to the list, to connect these qualities with the four floods (ogha), which are identical to the four yokes. See AN 4:10.

8. See Sn 1:3.

9. The pillar at a bathing ford: Cv V.l describes this as an immovable pillar, standing quite tall and buried deep in the ground near a bathing place, against which young villagers and boxers would rub their bodies while bathing so as to toughen them. The "extremes" in which others speak, according to SnA, are extremes of praise and criticism: These leave the sage, like the pillar, unmoved.

10. SnA: Straight as a shuttle = Having a mind unprejudiced by desire, aversion, delusion, or fear. See AN 4:19.

11. Consonant and discordant (sama and visama): Throughout ancient cultures, the terminology of music was used to describe the moral quality of people and acts. Discordant intervals or poorly-tuned musical instruments were metaphors for evil; harmonious intervals and well-tuned instruments were metaphors for good. In Pali, the term sama—"even"—described an instrument tuned on-pitch. AN 6:55 contains a famous passage in which the Buddha reminds Ven. Soṇa Kolivisa—who had been over-exerting himself in the practice—that a lute sounds appealing only if the strings are neither too taut nor too lax, but "evenly" tuned. This image would have special resonances with the Buddha's teaching on the middle way. It also adds meaning to the term samaṇa—monk or contemplative—which the texts frequently mention as being derived from sama. The word sāmaññā—"evenness," the quality of being concordant and in tune—also means the quality of being a contemplative. The true contemplative is always in tune with what is proper and good. See also DN 2, MN 61, MN 97. Nd II, in commenting on Sn 4:2, equates discordant conduct with the ten types of misconduct described in MN 41.

12. Intoxication: The three intoxications are intoxication with youth, with good health, and with life. See AN 3:39.

13. SnA: Ocean = The way defilement splashes into undesirable destinations.

14. Flood: The flow of defilement: sensuality, becoming, views, and ignorance. See SN 45:171.

15. Such (tādiṁ): Unchanging; unaffected by anything, while at the same time undefined.

II : The Lesser Chapter (Cūḷa Vagga)

2:1 Treasures

(This sutta is identical with Khp 6.)

Whatever spirits have gathered here,

—on the earth, in the sky—
may you all be happy
& listen intently to what I say.

Thus, spirits, you should all be attentive.
Show goodwill to the human race.
Day & night they bring offerings,
so, being heedful, protect them.

Whatever wealth—here or beyond—
whatever exquisite treasure in the heavens,
does not, for us, equal the Tathāgata.
This, too, is an exquisite treasure in the Buddha.
By this truth may there be well-being.

The exquisite deathless—ending, dispassion—
discovered by the Sakyan Sage in concentration:
There is nothing to equal that Dhamma.
This, too, is an exquisite treasure in the Dhamma.
By this truth may there be well-being.

What the excellent Awakened One extolled as pure
and called the concentration
of unmediated knowing[1]:
No equal to that concentration can be found.
This, too, is an exquisite treasure in the Dhamma.
By this truth may there be well-being.

The eight persons—the four pairs—
praised by those at peace:
They, disciples of the One Well-Gone, deserve offerings.
What is given to them bears great fruit.
    This, too, is an exquisite treasure in the Saṅgha.
    By this truth may there be well-being.

Those who, devoted, firm-minded,
apply themselves to Gotama's message,
on attaining their goal, plunge into the deathless,
freely enjoying the liberation they've gained.
    This, too, is an exquisite treasure in the Saṅgha.
    By this truth may there be well-being.

An Indra pillar,[2] planted in the earth,
    that even the four winds cannot shake:
That, I tell you, is like the person of integrity,
who—having comprehended
the noble truths—sees.
    This, too, is an exquisite treasure in the Saṅgha.
    By this truth may there be well-being.

Those who have seen clearly the noble truths
well-taught by the one deeply discerning—
regardless of what [later] might make them heedless—
will come to no eighth state of becoming,[3]
    This, too, is an exquisite treasure in the Saṅgha.
    By this truth may there be well-being.

At the moment of attaining sight,
one abandons three things:
    identity-views, uncertainty,
    & any attachment to habits & practices.[4]
One is completely released
from the four states of deprivation,[5]
and incapable of committing
the six great wrongs.[6]
    This, too, is an exquisite treasure in the Saṅgha.
    By this truth may there be well-being.

Whatever bad deed one may do
—in body, speech, or in mind—
one cannot hide it:
an incapability ascribed
to one who has seen the Way.
    This, too, is an exquisite treasure in the Saṅgha.
    By this truth may there be well-being.

Like a forest grove with flowering tops
in the first month of the heat of the summer,
so is the foremost Dhamma he taught,
for the highest benefit, leading to unbinding.
    This, too, is an exquisite treasure in the Buddha.
    By this truth may there be well-being.

Foremost,
foremost-knowing,
foremost-giving,
foremost-bringing,
    unsurpassed, he taught the
foremost Dhamma.
    This, too, is an exquisite treasure in the Buddha.
    By this truth may there be well-being.

Ended the old, there is no new taking birth.
Dispassioned their minds toward future becoming,
they,
                with no seed,
                no desire for growth,
enlightened,   go out like this flame.[z]
    This, too, is an exquisite treasure in the Saṅgha.
    By this truth may there be well-being.

Whatever spirits have gathered here,
    —on the earth, in the sky—
let us pay homage to the Buddha,
the Tathāgata worshipped by beings
human & divine.
    May there be

well-being.

Whatever spirits have gathered here,
—on the earth, in the sky—
let us pay homage to the Dhamma
& the Tathāgata worshipped by beings
human & divine.
May there be
well-being.

Whatever spirits have gathered here,
—on the earth, in the sky—
let us pay homage to the Saṅgha
& the Tathāgata worshipped by beings
human & divine.
May there be
well-being.

vv. 222–238

Notes

1. This is apparently equivalent to the liberation of immediacy, mentioned in Thig 5:8, and the concentration that is the fruit of gnosis, mentioned in AN 9:37.

2. Indra-pillar: A tall hardwood pillar, planted at the entrance to a village. Similar analogies for the awakened mind are found at AN 6:55 and AN 9:26.

3. The person who has reached this stage in the practice will be reborn at most seven more times. See AN 3:88. On the danger of heedlessness for one who has reached this level of awakening, see SN 55:40.

4. These three qualities are the fetters abandoned when one gains one's first glimpse of unbinding at stream-entry (the moment when one enters the stream to full awakening).

5. Four states of deprivation: rebirth as an animal, a hungry ghost, an angry demon, or a denizen of hell. In the Buddhist cosmology, none of these states is eternal.

6. According to SnA, the six great wrongs are: murdering one's mother, murdering one's father, murdering an arahant (fully awakened individual), wounding a Buddha, causing a schism in the Saṅgha, or choosing anyone other than a Buddha as one's foremost teacher. The first five are listed in AN 5:129 as leading immediately to hell after death.

7. See Thig 5:10.

2:2 Raw Stench

According to SnA, this poem is a dialogue between a brahman ascetic, Tissa, and the previous Buddha, Kassapa, who—unlike "our" Buddha, Gotama—was born into the brahman caste.

Tissa:

"Those peacefully eating millet, Job's tears, green gram, leaf-fruit, tuber-fruit, water-chestnut-fruit, obtained in line with the Dhamma, don't desire sensual-pleasures or tell falsehoods.

But when eating what is well-made,
well-prepared,
exquisite, given, offered by others,
when consuming cooked rice,
Kassapa, one consumes a raw stench.

Yet you, kinsman of Brahmā, say,
'Raw stench is not proper for me,' while consuming cooked rice and the well-prepared fleshes of birds.
So I ask you, Kassapa, the meaning of that:
Of what sort is 'raw stench' for you?"

The Buddha Kassapa:

"Killing living beings,
hunting, cutting, binding, theft, lying, fraud, deceptions, useless recitations,
associating with the wives of others:
This is a raw stench,
not the eating of meat.

Those people here
who are unrestrained in sensuality, greedy for flavors,
mixed together with what's impure, annihilationists,
discordant[1] & indomitable:
    This is a raw stench,
    not the eating of meat.

Those who are rough, pitiless, eating the flesh off your back, betraying their friends,
uncompassionate, arrogant, habitually ungenerous,
giving to no one:
    This is a raw stench,
not the eating of meat.

Anger, intoxication,
stubbornness, hostility,
deceptiveness, resentment, boasting, conceit & pride, befriending those of no integrity:
    This is a raw stench,
    not the eating of meat.

Those of evil habits,
debt-repudiators, informers, cheats in trading, counterfeiters, vile men who do evil things:
    This is a raw stench,
    not the eating of meat.

Those people here
who are unrestrained toward beings, taking what's others',
intent on injury,
immoral hunters, harsh, disrespectful:
    This is a raw stench,

not the eating of meat.

Those who are very greedy, constantly intent
on hindering and killing;
beings who, after passing away,
go to darkness,
fall headfirst into hell:
This is a raw stench,
not the eating of meat.

No fish & meat,[2]
no fasting, no nakedness, no shaven head, no tangled hair,
no rough animal skins,
no performance of fire oblations, or the many austerities to become an immortal in the world, no chants, no oblations, no performance of sacrifices at the proper season—purify a mortal
who hasn't crossed over doubt.

One should go about
guarded
with regard to those things, one's faculties understood,
standing firm in the Dhamma, delighting in being straightforward & mild.
Attachments past,
all suffering abandoned,
the enlightened one isn't smeared
by what's heard or seen."

Thus the Blessed One,
explained the meaning again & again.

The one who had mastered chants understood it.
With variegated verses
    the sage—
free from raw stench, unfettered, indomitable[3]— proclaimed it.
Hearing the Awakened One's well-spoken word—
free from raw stench,
dispelling all stress—
the one with lowered mind paid homage to the Tathāgata, chose the Going Forth right there.

vv. 239–252

Notes

1. Visama: See Sn 1:12, note 11.

2. According to SnA, this means "abstaining from fish & meat."

3. Durannaya. Notice that being indomitable, a "raw stench" in a discordant person, becomes a positive trait in the awakened. This sort of contrast provides the basis for the wordplay that the Sutta Nipāta occasionally uses to describe the awakened in a paradoxical way. See, for instance, the conclusion to Sn 4:13.

2:3 Shame

One who,
flouting, despising
a sense of shame, saying, "I am your friend," but not grasping
what he could do [to help]:
Know him as
"Not one of mine."

One who,
among friends,
speaks endearing words
to which he doesn't conform, the wise recognize as speaking without doing.

He's not a friend
who's always wary,
suspecting a split,
focusing just on your weakness.
But him on whom you can depend,
like a child on its parent's breast:
That's a true friend whom others can't split from you.

Carrying one's manly burden, the fruits & rewards develop the conditions that make for joy, the bliss that brings praise.
Drinking the savor of seclusion,
the savor of calm,
one is freed from evil, devoid
of distress,

refreshed with the savor
of rapture in the Dhamma.[1]

2:4 Protection

(This sutta is identical with Khp 5.)

I have heard that at one time the Blessed One was staying near Sāvatthī in Jeta's Grove, Anāthapiṇḍika's monastery. Then a certain deva, in the far extreme of the night, her extreme radiance lighting up the entirety of Jeta's Grove, went to the Blessed One. On arrival, having bowed down to him, she stood to one side. As she was standing there, she addressed him with a verse.

"Many devas & human beings
give thought to protection,
desiring well-being.
Tell, then, the highest protection."

The Buddha:

"Not consorting with fools,
consorting with the wise,
paying homage to those worthy of homage:
This is the highest protection.

Living in a civilized land,
having made merit in the past,
directing oneself rightly[1]:
This is the highest protection.

Broad knowledge, skill,
well-mastered discipline,
well-spoken words:
This is the highest protection.

Support for one's mother & father,[2]
assistance to one's wife and children, consistency in one's work:
This is the highest protection.

Generosity, living in rectitude,
assistance to one's relatives,
deeds that are blameless:
    This is the highest protection.

Avoiding, abstaining from evil;
refraining from intoxicants,
being heedful of mental qualities:
    This is the highest protection.

Respect, humility,
contentment, gratitude,
hearing the Dhamma on timely occasions:
    This is the highest protection.

Patience, being easy to instruct,
seeing contemplatives,
discussing the Dhamma on timely occasions:
    This is the highest protection.

Austerity, celibacy,
seeing the noble truths,
realizing unbinding:
    This is the highest protection.

A mind that, when touched
by the ways of the world,[3]
is unshaken, sorrowless, dustless, at rest:
    This is the highest protection.

When acting in this way,
everywhere undefeated,
people go everywhere in well-being:
    This is their highest protection."

vv. 258–269

Notes

1. These are three of the four "wheels" leading to wealth and prosperity. See AN 4:31.

2. See AN 2:31–32.

3. Ways of the world (lokadhamma): gain, loss, status, loss of status, praise, criticism, pleasure, pain. See AN 8:6 and AN 4:192.

See also: SN 3:5; AN 3:110; AN 4:128; AN 10:17

2:5 Suciloma

(This sutta is identical with SN 10:3.)

I have heard that on one occasion the Blessed One was staying in Gayā at Ṭaṁkitamañca, the haunt of Suciloma [NeedleHair] the yakkha. And on that occasion Khara [Rough] the yakkha and Suciloma the yakkha passed by not far from the Blessed One.

Khara the yakkha said to Suciloma the yakkha, "That's a contemplative."

"That's not a contemplative. That's a fake contemplative. I'll find out whether that's a contemplative or a fake contemplative."

So Suciloma the yakkha approached the Blessed One and on arrival leaned his body up against the Blessed One. The Blessed One leaned his body away. So Suciloma the yakkha said to the Blessed One, "Are you afraid of me, contemplative?"

"No, I'm not afraid of you, friend, just that your touch is evil."

"I will ask you a question, contemplative. If you can't answer me, I will hurl out your mind or rip open your heart or, grabbing you by the feet, hurl you across the Ganges."

"My friend, I see no one in the cosmos with its devas, Māras, & Brahmās, in this generation with its contemplatives & brahmans, its royalty & commonfolk, who could hurl out my mind or rip open my heart or, grabbing me by the feet, hurl me across the Ganges. But nevertheless, ask me what you wish."

So Suciloma the yakkha addressed the Blessed One in verse:

> Passion & aversion
> come from what cause?
> Displeasure, delight,
> horripilation
> are born from what?

Arising from what do thoughts fling the mind around,
as boys, a (captive) crow?

The Buddha:

Passion & aversion
come from this[1] as a cause;
displeasure, delight,
horripilation
are born from this;
arising from this thoughts fling the mind around,
as boys, a (captive) crow:
They're born from affection arisen from the mind, from oneself,[2]
like the trunk-born (shoots) of a banyan tree,
thick, attached to sensuality,
like a māluva vine spread in a forest.
Those who discern where it's born drive it out—listen, yakkha!
They cross over this flood,
so hard to cross,
never crossed before,
for the sake of no further becoming.

vv. 270–273

Notes

1. According to SnA, "this" is one's own self-state (attabhāva), left unidentified in the verse. However, it seems more likely that "this" refers to the affection born, in turn, from one's own mind/self (see note 2) as mentioned after the simile of the boys with the captive crow. See DN 21, Sn 4:11, and the introduction to MN 18.

2. "The mind, oneself": Two meanings of the word, attan.

2:6 The Dhamma Life

Living the Dhamma life,
living the holy life:
    This, they say, is the highest power.
But if, having gone forth from home into homelessness,
you are harsh-mouthed,
delighting in injury, a stupid beast,
    your life is more evil.
    You increase your own dust.
A monk delighting in quarrels, shrouded under delusion, doesn't know the Dhamma even when proclaimed by the Awakened One.
Injuring those developed in mind,[1]
he, surrounded by ignorance, doesn't know defilement to be the path
that leads to hell.
Arriving at deprivation,
from womb to womb,
from darkness to darkness,
a monk of this sort, after death, comes to suffering.
Just like a cesspit, full, used for many years,
one of this sort, befouled, would be hard to clean.

Monks, whoever you know to be like this,
    depending on homes,
    evil in his desires,

evil in his resolves,
evil in behavior & range,
all of you, united, shun him.

Sweep away the sweepings, throw away the trash,
then remove the chaff:
non-contemplatives
who think they're contemplatives.
Having swept away those of evil desires, evil in behavior & range,
then pure, affiliate mindfully with the pure.
Then, united, astute,
you will put an end
to suffering & stress.[2]

vv. 274–283

Notes

1. According to MN 36, "developed in mind" means able to experience painful feelings without their invading and remaining in the mind.

2. These last two verses are quoted in the Milinda Pañhā.

2:7 Brahman Principles

I have heard that on one occasion the Blessed One was staying near Sāvatthī in Jeta's Grove, Anāthapiṇḍika's monastery. Then many Kosalan brahmans of great means—old, aged, advanced in years, having come to the last stage of life—approached the Blessed One. On arrival, they exchanged courteous greetings with him. After an exchange of friendly greetings & courtesies, they sat to one side. As they were sitting there, they said to him, "Master Gotama, do brahmans at present live in conformity with the brahman principles of ancient brahmans?"

"No, brahmans. Brahmans at present don't live in conformity with the brahman principles of ancient brahmans."

"It would be good if Master Gotama described the brahman principles of ancient brahmans, if it wouldn't burden him."

"In that case, brahmans, listen and pay close attention. I will speak."

"As you say, master," the brahmans of great means responded to the Blessed One.

The Blessed One said:

> Seers, before, were austere > & restrained in mind.
> Abandoning the five strings of sensuality,
> they practiced for their own benefit.
> They had no cattle,
> no gold,
> no wealth.
> They had study
> as their wealth.
> They protected the Brahmā treasure.[1]
> They did not despise what was prepared for them:
> food set at doors, prepared out of conviction for those who seek.

Prosperous lands & kingdoms honored brahmans with multi-colored clothes, bedding, & dwellings.
Brahmans
protecting their principles, protected by law,[2]
were not to be violated, not to be beaten.
No one could block them from the doors of any home.

For 48 years (young brahmans) followed the holy life.
Brahmans of old practiced the search for knowledge & conduct.
Brahmans went to no other (caste),[3] nor did they buy their wives.
Living together from mutual love, having come together, they found joy together.
Aside from the time
after menstruation, brahmans didn't engage in copulation.

They praised:
the holy life, virtue,
being straightforward, mild, austere, composed, harmless, enduring.
The foremost brahman among them,
firm in perseverance,
didn't engage in copulation even in a dream.
Those imitating his practice praised the holy life, virtue, & endurance.
They asked for rice, bedding, cloth, butter & oil.

Having collected all that in line with rectitude, from that they performed the sacrifice.
And in setting up the sacrifice,
they didn't harm cows.

    "Like a mother, father, brother, or other relative,
    cows are our foremost friends.
    From them comes medicine.
    They give food, strength, beauty, & happiness."

Knowing this line of reasoning,
they didn't harm cows.
Delicate, with large bodies, beautiful, prestigious,
brahmans were committed to standards of what should & shouldn't be done in line with their principles.
As long as this lasted in the world, humanity prospered in happiness.

But a perversion came among them.
Seeing, little by little,
the splendor of kings—
women well-ornamented,
chariots yoked to thoroughbreds,
    well-made, with elaborate embroideries,
houses & homes,
    well-proportioned, planned & laid out lavish human wealth,
surrounded by circles of cows, joined with groups of excellent women—
    the brahmans grew greedy.
Having composed chants there,
they went up to Okkāka.

"You have much wealth & grain.
Sacrifice! Much is your property!
Sacrifice! Much is your wealth!"

Then the king, lord of charioteers,
induced by the brahmans,
having performed these sacrifices—
the horse sacrifice, the human sacrifice, sammāpāsa, vājapeyya, & niraggaḷa[4]—
gave the brahmans wealth:
cows, bedding, clothes,
women adorned,
chariots yoked to thoroughbreds,
well-made, with elaborate embroideries,
Having had delightful homes, well-proportioned, filled throughout[5]
with various grains,
he gave the brahmans wealth.

And they, receiving the wealth there, found joy together in hoarding it.
Overcome by desire,
their craving grew more.
Having composed chants there,
they went up to Okkāka again.

"Like water & earth,
gold, wealth, & grain,
are cows to human beings.
This is a requisite for beings.
Sacrifice! Much is your property!
Sacrifice! Much is your wealth!"

Then the king, lord of charioteers,
induced by the brahmans,
killed in a sacrifice
many hundred-thousands of cows.
The cows—
meek like sheep,

giving milk by the bucket—hadn't,
with their hooves or horns or anything else, done
anyone
any harm.
    But the king,
grabbing them by the horns,
killed them with a knife.

Then the devas, the Fathers, Indra, and rakkhasas
cried out,
    "An injustice!"
when the knife fell on the cows.

Three were the diseases before then:
desire, hunger, & aging.
But from violence against cattle came ninety-eight.
This injustice of violence has come down as ancient.
    The innocent are killed;
    the sacrificers fall away from the Dhamma.

This tradition—ancient, vile—is criticized by the observant.
Where people see such a thing, they criticize the sacrificer.
With the Dhamma perishing in this way, merchants are split from workers, noble warriors are split far apart,
the wife despises the husband.
Noble warriors, kinsman of Brahmā, and any others protected by clan, repudiating the doctrine of their birth, fall under sensuality's sway.

When this was said, those brahmans of great means said to the Blessed One: "Magnificent, Master Gotama! Magnificent! Just as if he were to place upright what was overturned, to reveal what was hidden, to show the way to one who was lost, or to carry a lamp into the dark so that those with eyes could see forms, in the same way has Master Gotama—through many lines of reasoning—made the Dhamma clear. We go to Master Gotama for refuge, to the Dhamma, & to the Saṅgha of monks. May Master Gotama remember us as lay followers who have gone for refuge from this day forward, for life."

vv. 284–315

Notes

1. According to SnA, "Brahmā treasure" refers to such mind states as the development of goodwill. See Sn 1:8, note 1.

2. "Protecting their principles, protected by law": two possible meanings of dhamma-rakkhitā. SnA explains this term with reference to the Dhamma passage, "The Dhamma protects those who live by the Dhamma." (Thag 4:10)

3. I.e., in choosing their wives. See AN 5:191.

4. Three types of sacrifice defined by details in the equipment used.

5. Reading sabbaso with the Thai edition. The other editions read bhāgaso, "laid out."

2:8 A Boat

Although often lost in translation, the overall structure of this poem is clearly articulated in the Pali. The first seven verses—coming under the "because" (yasmā)—state reasons, while the last verse, under the "so" (tasmā), draws the conclusion: Find a good teacher and practice the Dhamma.

Because:
When you honor
—as the devas, Indra—
one from whom you might learn the Dhamma,
he, learned, honored,
confident in you,
shows you the Dhamma.

You, enlightened, heedful, befriending a teacher like that, practicing the Dhamma
in line with the Dhamma, pondering,
giving it priority,
become knowledgeable,
clear-minded,
subtle.

But if you consort with a piddling fool who's envious,
hasn't come to the goal, you'll go to death without having cleared up
the Dhamma right here,
with

your doubts unresolved.

Like a man gone down to a river—turbulent, flooding, swift-flowing—and swept away in the current:
How can he help others across?

Even so:
He who hasn't cleared up the Dhamma, attended to the meaning of what the learned say, crossed over his own doubts:
How can he get others to comprehend?

But as one who's embarked on a sturdy boat,
with rudder & oars,
would—thoughtful, skillful, knowing the needed techniques—carry many others across,

even so
an attainer-of-knowledge, learned, developed in mind,[1] unwavering can get other people to comprehend—when the conditions have arisen for them to lend ear.

So:
You should befriend
a person of integrity—
learned, intelligent.
Practicing so
as to know the goal,
when you've experienced the Dhamma,

you get bliss.

vv. 316–323

Note

1. According to MN 36, "developed in mind" means able to experience painful feelings without their invading and remaining in the mind.

2:9 With What Virtue?

This sutta mentions the metaphorical notion of "heartwood" (sāra) three times. Although sāra as a metaphor is often translated as "essence," this misses some of the metaphor's implications. When x is said to have y as its heartwood, that means that the proper development of x yields y, and that y is the most valuable part of x—just as a tree, as it matures, develops heartwood, and the heartwood is the most valuable part of the tree.

"With what virtue,
what behavior,
nurturing what actions, would a person become rightly based and attain the ultimate goal?"

"One should be respectful of one's superiors[1] & not envious;
should have a sense of the time for seeing teachers;[2] should value the opportunity when a talk on Dhamma's in progress; should listen intently
to well-spoken words;
should go at the proper time, humbly, casting off arrogance, to one's teacher's presence;
should both recollect & follow
the Dhamma, its meaning, restraint, & the holy life.

Delighting in Dhamma, savoring Dhamma,
established in Dhamma,

with a sense of how to investigate Dhamma,
one should not speak in ways destructive of Dhamma,[3] should guide oneself with true, well-spoken words.

Shedding
laughter,chattering,
lamentation, hatred,
deception, deviousness, greed, pride,
confrontation, roughness, astringency, infatuation,
one should go about free of intoxication,
with steadfast mind.

Understanding's the heartwood of well-spoken words;
concentration, the heartwood of learning & understanding.

When a person is hasty & heedless his discernment & learning don't grow.
While those who delight in the Dhamma taught by the noble ones, are unsurpassed
in word, action, & mind.
They, established in
calm,
composure, &
concentration,
have reached
what discernment & learning have as their heartwood."[4]

vv. 324–330

Notes

1. According to SnA, one's superiors include those who have more wisdom than oneself, more skill in concentration and other aspects of the path than oneself, and those senior to oneself.

2. SnA says that the right time to see a teacher is when one is overcome with passion, aversion, and delusion, and cannot find a way out on one's own. This echoes a passage in AN 6:26, in which Ven. Mahā Kaccāna says that the right time to visit a "monk worthy of esteem" is when one needs help in overcoming any of the five hindrances or when one doesn't yet have an appropriate theme to focus on to put an end to the mind's effluents.

3. SnA equates "words destructive of the Dhamma" with "animal talk." See the discussion under Pācittiya 85 in The Buddhist Monastic Code.

4. The heartwood of learning & discernment is release. See MN 29 and 30.

2:10 Initiative

Get up!
Sit up!
What's your need for sleep?
And what sleep is there for the afflicted, pierced by the arrow,
oppressed?

Get up!
Sit up!
Train firmly for the sake of peace.
Don't let the king of death,
—seeing you heedless—
deceive you,
bring you under his sway.

Cross over the attachment to which human & heavenly beings remain, desiring,
tied.
Don't let the moment pass by.
Those for whom the moment is past
grieve, consigned to hell.

Heedlessness is dust, dust
comes from heedlessness, has heedlessness
on its heels.
Through heedfulness & clear knowing you'd remove your own arrow.

2:11 Rāhula

"From living with him often do you not despise the wise man?
Is the one who holds up the torch for human beings
honored by you?"

"From living with him often
I don't despise the wise man.
The one who holds up the torch
for human beings
is honored by me."

* * *

"Abandoning the five strings of sensuality, endearing, charming,
going forth from home
through conviction,
  be one who puts an end
  to suffering & stress.
Cultivate admirable friends and an isolated dwelling, secluded, with next-to-no noise.
Know moderation in eating.
Robe, alms-food,
requisites, dwellings:
  Don't create craving for these.
  Don't be one who returns to the world.
Restrained in the Pāṭimokkha and the five faculties, have mindfulness immersed in the body,
be one who's cultivated disenchantment.
Avoid the theme of beauty, connected with passion.

Develop the mind in the unattractive—gathered into one,[1] well-centered.
Develop the themeless.[2]
Give up obsession with conceit.
Then, from having broken through conceit,
you will go about,
stilled."

In this way, the Blessed One often instructed Ven. Rāhula[3] with these verses.

vv. 335–342

Notes

1. Ek'agga, reading agga in the sense of "gathering place."
2. On the themeless concentration, see MN 121 and SN 41:7.
3. At AN 1:148 (1:209) the Buddha cites Ven. Rāhula, his son, as being foremost among the monks in his desire for training.

2:12 Vaṅgīsa

I have heard that on one occasion the Blessed One was staying near Āḷavī at the Aggāḷava shrine. And on that occasion Ven. Vaṅgīsa's[1] preceptor, an elder named Nigrodha Kappa, had recently totally unbound at the Aggāḷava shrine. Then as Ven. Vaṅgīsa was alone in seclusion, this train of thought arose in his awareness: "Has my preceptor totally unbound, or has he not totally unbound?"

Then, emerging from his seclusion in the late afternoon, Ven. Vaṅgīsa went to the Blessed One and, on arrival, having bowed down to him, sat to one side. As he was sitting there, he said to the Blessed One, "Just now, as I was alone in seclusion, this train of thought arose in my awareness: 'Has my preceptor totally unbound, or has he not totally unbound?'"

Then, arranging his robe over one shoulder and placing his hands palm-to-palm over his heart toward the Blessed One, Ven. Vaṅgīsa addressed the Blessed One in verses:

> "We ask the Teacher of supreme discernment, > who has cut off uncertainty in the here-&-now:
> A monk has died at the Aggāḷava shrine—> well-known, prestigious, with mind fully unbound.
>
> Nigrodha Kappa was his name, > given by you, Blessed One, to that brahman.
> He went about revering you—> who sees the firm Dhamma—> intent on release, with persistence aroused.
>
> Sakyan, All-around Eye,[2]
> we all, too, want to know of that disciple:
> Ready to hear are our ears.
> You, our teacher: You are unexcelled.
>
> Cut through our uncertainty. Tell me this,

make known, One of discernment deep,
that he was totally unbound.
Like Thousand-eyed Sakka, in the midst of the devas,[3] speak, All-around Eye, in ours.

Here, whatever snares there are, paths of delusion, siding with not-knowing, bases of uncertainty:
On reaching the Tathāgata, they don't exist,
as that Eye is the foremost of men.

For if no man were ever to disperse defilements—as the wind, a dark mass of clouds—the whole world would be enveloped in darkness.
Even brilliant people wouldn't shine bright.

But the enlightened are makers of light.
Thus I think you're that, enlightened one.
We have come to one who knows through clear-seeing.
Make Kappa shine in our assembly.

Quickly, handsome one, stir your handsome voice.
Like a swan,[4] stretching out (its neck), call gently with rounded tones, well-modulated.
We all listen to you, sitting upright.

Pleading, I shall get the pure one to speak,
he whose birth & death are abandoned.
For people run-of-the-mill haven't the power to bring about what they desire, but Tathāgatas do have the power to bring about what they have pondered.

This, your consummate explanation, is rightly-grasped, you of discernment rightly straight.
This last salutation is offered:
Knowing, don't delude us,
one of discernment supreme.

Understanding the noble Dhamma from high to low,
knowing, don't delude us,
hero supreme.
I long for the water of your speech as if distressed in mind by the heat in the summer.
Rain down a torrent.[5]

Was the holy life, as led by Kappa in line with his aim? Was it not in any way in vain?
Did he unbind with no fuel remaining?[6]
Let us hear how he was released."

"Here he cut off craving for name-&-form,
the current of the Dark One, the long-time obsession.
He has crossed over birth & death."
So spoke the Blessed One, excelling in five.[7]

"Hearing this, your word, highest of seers,
I am brightened & calmed.
Surely, my question was not in vain, nor was I deceived by the brahman.
As he spoke, so he acted:
He was a disciple
of the One Awakened.
He has cut through the tough, stretched-out net of deceitful Death.
He, Kappiya, saw, Blessed One,
    the beginning of clinging.
He, Kappayāna,[8] has gone beyond the realm of Death
    so very hard to cross."

vv. 343–358

Notes

1. Cited in AN 1:148 (1:212) as foremost among the monks in having extemporaneous inspiration. His verses are collected in SN 8 and in Thag 21. He appears in Sn both here and at Sn 3:3.

2. From Vedic times it was customary to believe that divine beings had total vision of reality because they could see with all parts of their bodies—thus they were "all-around eyes." At the same time, there was a belief that it was auspicious to gaze into a divine being's eye, which meant that worshippers were content to see any part of the divine being's body. Both of these beliefs carried over into Buddhist devotional practice. For more on this point, see DN 16, note 44. See also, Jan Gonda, Eye and Gaze in the Veda.

3. The word majjhe—"in the midst"—functions as a lamp here.

4. Reading haṁso'va with the Burmese edition.

5. Reading sutaṁ pavassa, interpreting the "u" as an "o" shortened to fit the meter.

6. The unbinding element of the arahant who has passed away. See Iti 44.

7. According to SnA, "five" here stands for the five faculties and other sets of five qualities that led to the Buddha's awakening.

8. Kappiya, Kappayāna: Honorific forms of Kappa.

2:13 Right Wandering

"I ask the sage of abundant discernment, crossed over to the far shore, totally unbound, steadfast in mind:
Leaving home, rejecting sensuality, how does one wander rightly in the world?"[1]

The Buddha:

"Whoever's omens are uprooted, as are meteors, dreams, & marks,[2] whose fault of omens is completely abandoned:
He would wander rightly in the world.

A monk should subdue passion for sensualities human & even divine.
Having gone past becoming,
and met with the Dhamma,
he would wander rightly in the world.

Putting behind him
divisive tale-bearing,
a monk should abandon anger & meanness.
With favoring & opposing totally abandoned,
he would wander rightly in the world.

Having abandoned dear & undear, independent—through no-clinging—of anything at all,
fully released from fetters,
he would wander rightly in the world.

He finds no essence in acquisitions, having subdued passion-desire for graspings, independent is he, by others unled:

He would wander rightly in the world.

Having rightly found the Dhamma, he is unobstructed in speech, mind, & act.
Aspiring to unbinding,
he would wander rightly in the world.

A monk who'd not gloat, "He venerates me," or brood when insulted, or be elated on receiving food from another:
He would wander rightly in the world.

Fully abandoning greed & becoming,
abstaining from cutting & binding (other beings),
he, having crossed over doubt, de-arrowed,
he would wander rightly in the world.

Having found what's appropriate for himself,
the monk wouldn't harm anyone in the world, Having found the Dhamma as it actually is,
he would wander rightly in the world.

In whom there are no obsessions, his unskillful roots uprooted, with no longing, no
expectations:
He would wander rightly in the world.

His effluents ended, conceit abandoned, beyond reach of every road to passion, tamed, totally unbound, steadfast in mind:
He would wander rightly in the world.

Convinced, learned, having seen certainty, not following factions among those who are factious, enlightened; his greed, aversion, & irritation subdued:
He would wander rightly in the world.

Victorious, pure, his roof opened up,[3] a master of dhammas, gone beyond & unperturbed, skilled in the knowledge of fabrication-cessation:

He would wander rightly in the world.

Gone beyond speculations about futures & pasts, and—having passed by—purified in his discernment, fully released from all sense-media[4]:
He would wander rightly in the world.

Knowing the state,
meeting the Dhamma,
seeing the opened-up
when his effluents
are abandoned
from the ending
of all acquisitions:
He would wander rightly in the world."

"Yes, Blessed One, that's just how it is.
Any monk dwelling thus,
tamed, gone totally beyond all things conducive for fetters[5]:
He would wander rightly in the world."

vv. 359–375

Notes

1. SnA maintains that this sutta took place on the same day as the Mahāsamaya Sutta (The Great Meeting, DN 20).

2. DN 2 lists various forms of fortune telling dealing with omens, meteors, dreams, and marks as types of wrong livelihood for a monk.

3. See Ud 5:5 and Thag 6:13:

> Rain soddens what's covered
> & doesn't sodden what's open.
> So open up what's covered up,
> so that it won't get soddened by the rain.

4. See SN 35:117 and AN 4:173.

2:14 Dhammika

I have heard that on one occasion the Blessed One was staying near Sāvatthī in Jeta's Grove, Anāthapiṇḍika's monastery. Then Dhammika the lay follower, together with 500 other lay followers, approached the Blessed One and, on arrival, having bowed down to him, sat to one side. As he was sitting there, he addressed the Blessed One in verses:

"I ask you, Gotama, Deeply Discerning: How-acting does one become a good disciple—either one gone from home into homelessness, or a lay follower with a home?

For you discern the destination & future course of the world along with its devas
—there is no one equal to you in seeing the subtle goal;
for they call you foremost, awakened.

Understanding all knowledge the whole Dhamma,[1]
you proclaim it to beings with sympathetic mind.
Your roof opened up,[2] All-around Eye,[3] you, stainless, illumine the whole world.

He came to your presence—Erāvaṇa, the nāga king,[4] having heard, 'Conqueror.'
Having consulted with you, having heard, he understood and, satisfied, (thought,) 'Good.'

And King Vessavaṇa Kuvera[5] came, inquiring about the Dhamma.
To him, too, you spoke when asked.

And he too, having heard, was satisfied.

And these sectarians, debaters by habit, whether Ājīvakas or Nigaṇṭhas, don't overtake you in terms of discernment, as a person standing doesn't catch up
with one going quickly.

And these brahmans, debaters by habit,
any elderly brahmans,
and any others who consider themselves debaters, all depend on you for the meaning.

For this Dhamma is subtle & blissful.
This, Blessed One, well set-forth by you:
We all want to hear it.
Tell it to us, Excellent Awakened, when asked.

All these monks are sitting together—and the lay followers, right there—to hear.
Let them listen to the Dhamma awakened to by one who is stainless, as the devas listen to Vasavant's[6] well-spoken word."

The Buddha:

"Listen to me, monks. I will let you hear the Dhamma of polishing away. Live by it,[7] all of you.

May those who are thoughtful, seeing the purpose, partake of the duties proper for one gone forth.

A monk should surely not wander
at the wrong time.
He should go for alms in the village
at the right time.
For attachments get attached to one going
at the wrong time.
That's why they don't wander at the wrong time,
the awakened.

Sights, sounds, tastes,

smells, & tactile sensations
    intoxicate beings.
Subduing desire for these things,
one should, at the right time, enter for alms.

Having received alms in proper season,
a monk, returning alone, should sit down in solitude.
Pondering what's inside, his mind-state collected,
he should not let his heart wander outside.

If he should converse with a disciple,
a monk, or anyone else,
he should utter the exquisite Dhamma, and not divisive speech or disparagement of others.

For some retaliate against arguments.
We don't praise those of limited discernment.
Attachments get attached on account of this & that,
for they send their minds far away from there.

Having heard the Dhamma taught by the One Well-Gone, the disciple of foremost discernment, having considered it, should resort to almsfood, a dwelling, a place to sit & lie down,
and water for washing dust from his robe.

So a monk should stay unsmeared by these things—almsfood, a dwelling, a place to sit & lie down,
and water for washing dust from his robe—
like a water-drop on a lotus.

As for the householder protocol,
I will tell you how-acting one becomes a good disciple, since the entire monk-practice can't be managed by those wealthy in property.

Laying aside violence toward all living creatures, both the firm & unfirm in the world,
one should not kill a living being, nor have it killed, nor condone killing by others.

Then the disciple should avoid consciously (taking) what's not given, —anything, anywhere—should not have it taken nor condone its taking.
He should avoid all (taking of) what's not given.

The observant person should avoid uncelibate behavior like a pit of glowing embers.
But if he's incapable of celibate behavior,
he should not transgress with the wife of another.

When gone to an audience hall or assembly, or one-on-one, he should not tell a lie, nor have it told, nor condone it's being told.
He should avoid every untruth.

Any householder who approves of this Dhamma should not take intoxicating drink, nor have others drink it, nor condone its being drunk, knowing that it ends in madness.

For from intoxication, fools do evil things and get others, heedless, to do them.
One should avoid this opening to demerit—madness, delusion—appealing to fools.

One should not kill a living being,
take what's not given, tell a lie, nor be a drinker.
One should abstain from uncelibate behavior—sexual intercourse—should not eat at night, a meal at the wrong time,
should not wear a garland or use scents, should sleep on a bed, on the ground, or on a mat,
For this, they say, is the eightfold uposatha, proclaimed by the Awakened One who has gone to the end of suffering & stress.

Then, having kept, well-accomplished, the eightfold uposatha
on the fourteenth, fifteenth, & eighth of the fortnight,[8]

and on special days of the fortnight, with clear & confident mind, the observant person
at dawn after the uposatha, confident, rejoicing,
should share food & drink, as is proper,
with the Saṅgha of monks.

One should righteously support mother & father, should engage in righteous[9] trade, One heedful in this householder protocol goes to the devas called Self-radiant."

vv. 376–404

Notes

1. "All… the whole": two meanings of the lamp-word, sabba.

2. See Sn 2:13, note 3.

3. See Sn 2:12, note 2.

4. According to SnA, Erāvaṇa was one of the devas dwelling in the heaven of the Thirty-three. An elephant in a previous life, he enjoyed taking on the form of a gigantic magical elephant (one of the meanings of "nāga"), displaying many powers, for the entertainment of the other devas in that heaven.

5. One of the four Great Kings, ruling over the yakkhas. See DN 20 and DN 32. Neither Erāvaṇa's nor Kuvera's visit to the Buddha is mentioned elsewhere in the Canon, although SnA insists that Kuvera's took place soon after the events reported in AN 7:53, in which he conversed with the lay woman, Nandamātā.

6. An epithet of Sakka, king of the devas in the heaven of the Thirty-three.

7. Reading carātha with the Thai edition. The PTS and Sinhalese edition have dharātha, remember.

8. The fourteen- or fifteen-day lunar cycle. The fourteenth/fifteenth days correspond to the days of the new and full moon. The eighth day, to the half-moon.

9. Dhammika, a reference to the interlocutor's name.

III : The Great Chapter (Mahā Vagga)

3:1 The Going Forth

I will praise the Going Forth, how he went forth, the One with Eyes, how he reasoned and chose the Going Forth.
"Household life is confining,
a realm of dust,
while going forth
is the open air."
Seeing this, he went forth.

On going forth,
he avoided evil deeds in body.
Abandoning verbal misconduct, he purified his livelihood.
Then he, the Buddha, went to Rājagaha, the mountain fortress of the Magadhans, and wandered for alms,
teeming with the foremost marks.
King Bimbisāra, standing in his palace, saw him,
and on seeing him, consummate in marks,
said this:
"Look at this one, sirs.
How handsome, stately, pure!
How consummate his demeanor!
Mindful, his eyes downcast, looking only a plow-length before him.
This one's not like one from a lowly lineage:
Have the royal messengers hurry to see where this monk will go."

They—the messengers dispatched—followed behind him.
    "Where will this monk go?
    Where will his dwelling place be?"
As he went from house to house—well-restrained, his sense-doors guarded,
    mindful, alert—
his bowl filled quickly.
Then he, the sage, completing his alms round, left the city, headed for Mount Paṇḍava.
    "That's where his dwelling will be."
Seeing him go to his dwelling place, three messengers sat down, while one returned to tell the king.
"That monk, your majesty,
on the flank of Paṇḍava, sits like a tiger, a bull,
a lion in a mountain cleft."

Hearing the messenger's words,
the noble-warrior king
straight away set out by royal coach, for Mount Paṇḍava.
Going as far as the coach would go,
the noble-warrior king
got down from the coach, went up on foot,
and on arrival sat down.
Sitting there,
he exchanged courteous greetings,
and after giving friendly greetings,
    said this:
"Young you are, and youthful,
in the first stage of youth, consummate in stature & coloring like a noble-warrior by birth.
You would look glorious in the vanguard of an army, arrayed with an elephant squadron.

I offer you wealth : Enjoy it.
I ask your birth : Inform me."

"Straight ahead, your majesty, by the foothills of the Himalayas, is a country consummate in energy & wealth, inhabited by Kosalans:
Solar by clan,
Sakyans by birth.
From that lineage I have gone forth,
but not in hope of sensuality.
Seeing the danger in sensuality
—and renunciation as rest—
I go to strive.

That's where my heart delights."

3:2 Exertion

To me—
    my mind resolute in exertion near the river Nerañjarā, making a great effort,
    doing jhāna
    to attain rest from the yoke—

Nāmuci[1] came,
    speaking words of compassion:
"You are ashen, thin.
    Death is in your presence.
Death
has 1,000 parts of you.
Only one part
is your life.
Live, good sir!
Life is better.
            Alive,
    you can do
    acts of merit.
Your living the holy life and performing the fire sacrifice will heap up much merit.
    What use is exertion to you?
Hard to follow
—the path of exertion—
hard to do, hard to sustain."

Saying these verses,
Māra stood in the Awakened One's presence.

And to that Māra, speaking thus,
the Blessed One
said this:

"Kinsman of the heedless, Evil One,
come here for whatever purpose:
I haven't, for merit,
even the least bit of need.
Those who have need of merit:
Those are the ones
Māra's fit to address.

In me are conviction
        austerity,
        persistence,
        discernment.
Why, when my mind is resolute,
do you petition me
    to live?
This wind could burn up even river currents.
Why, when my mind is resolute,
shouldn't my blood dry away?
As my blood dries up,
gall & phlegm dry up,
as muscles waste away,
the mind grows clearer;
mindfulness, discernment, concentration stand
    more firm.
Staying in this way, attaining the ultimate feeling,[2]
the mind has no interest in sensuality.
    See:
    a being's

purity!

Sensual passions are your first army.
Your second is called Discontent.
Your third is Hunger & Thirst.
Your fourth is called Craving.
Fifth is Sloth & Torpor.
Sixth is called Cowardice.
Your seventh is Uncertainty.
Hypocrisy & Stubbornness, your eighth.
Gains, Offerings, Fame, & Status wrongly gained, and whoever would praise self & disparage others:

That, Nāmuci, is your army,
the Dark One's commando force.
A coward can't defeat it, but one having defeated it gains bliss.
Do I carry muñja grass?[3]
I spit on my life.
Death in battle would be better for me than that I, defeated, survive.[4]

Sinking here, they don't appear, some brahmans & contemplatives.
They don't know the path by which those with good practices
go.

Seeing the bannered force on all sides—
the troops, Māra
along with his mount—
I go into battle.
May they not budge me
from my spot.

That army of yours,
that the world with its devas can't overcome,
I will smash with discernment—
as an unfired pot with a stone.

Making my resolve mastered, mindfulness well-established,
I will go about, from kingdom to kingdom, training many disciples.
They—heedful, resolute in mind, doing my bidding—
despite your wishes, will go
where, having gone,
there's no grief."

Māra:

"For seven years, I've dogged
the Blessed One's steps, but haven't gained an opening in the One Self-Awakened & glorious.
A crow circled a stone
the color of fat
—'Maybe I've found
something tender here.
Maybe there's something delicious'— but not getting anything delicious there, the crow went away.
Like the crow attacking the rock,
I weary myself with Gotama."

As he was overcome with sorrow, his lute fell from under his arm.
Then he, the despondent spirit, right there
disappeared.

Notes

1. Māra.

2. The highest equanimity that can be attained through jhāna.

3. Muñja grass was the ancient Indian equivalent of a white flag. A warrior expecting that he might have to surrender would take muñja grass into battle with him. If he did surrender, he would lie down with the muñja grass in his mouth. The Buddha, in asking this rhetorical question, is indicating that he is not the type of warrior who would carry muñja grass. If defeated, he would rather die than surrender.

4. This line is repeated in Thag 2:37.

3:3 Well-spoken

(This sutta is identical with SN 8:5.)

I have heard that on one occasion the Blessed One was staying near Sāvatthī in Jeta's Grove, Anāthapiṇḍika's monastery. There he addressed the monks, "Monks!"

"Yes, lord," the monks responded to him.

The Blessed One said: "Monks, speech endowed with four characteristics is well-spoken, not poorly spoken—faultless & not to be faulted by the observant. Which four? There is the case where a monk says only what is well-spoken, not what is poorly spoken; only what is just, not what is unjust; only what is endearing, not what is unendearing; only what is true, not what is false. Speech endowed with these four characteristics is well-spoken, not poorly spoken—faultless & not to be faulted by the observant."

That is what the Blessed One said. Having said this, the One Well-Gone, the Teacher, said further:

> The calm say that what is well-spoken is best;
> second, that one should say > what is just, not unjust;
> third, what's endearing, not unendearing;
> fourth, what is true, not false.

Then Ven. Vaṅgīsa,[1] rising from his seat, arranging his robe over one shoulder, faced the Blessed One with his hands palm-to-palm in front of his heart and said, "An inspiration has come to me, Blessed One! An inspiration has come to me, One Well-Gone!"

"Let the inspiration come to you, Vaṅgīsa," the Blessed One said.

Then Ven. Vaṅgīsa praised the Blessed One to his face with these fitting verses:

"Speak only the speech that neither torments self nor does harm to others.
That speech is truly well-spoken.

Speak only endearing speech, speech that is welcomed.
Speech when it brings no evil to others
is pleasant.

Truth, indeed, is deathless speech:
This is a primeval principle.
The goal and the Dhamma
—so say the calm—
are firmly established on truth.

The speech the Awakened One speaks,
for attaining unbinding,
rest,
for making an end
to the mass of stress:
That is the speech unsurpassed."

3:4 Sundarika Bhāradvāja

Another version of this encounter is recorded in SN 7:9.

I have heard that on one occasion the Blessed One was staying among the Kosalans on the bank of the River Sundarika. And on that occasion, the brahman Sundarika Bhāradvāja was offering a fire sacrifice and performing a fire oblation on the bank of the River Sundarika. Then, having offered the fire sacrifice and performed the fire oblation, he got up from his seat and looked around to the four directions, (thinking,) "Who should eat the remains of the offering?" He saw the Blessed One sitting not far away at the root of a tree with his head covered. On seeing him, he took the remains of the offering in his left hand and his water-pot in his right, and went to the Blessed One. Then the Blessed One, at the sound of the brahman Sundarika Bhāradvāja's footsteps, uncovered his head. The brahman Sundarika Bhāradvāja (thinking,) "This venerable one is shaven. This venerable one is a shaveling," wanted to turn back. But then the thought occurred to him, "Still, there are some brahmans who are shaven. What if, having approached him, I were to ask his caste?"

So he went to the Blessed One and, on arrival, asked: "What is the venerable one's birth-caste?"[1]

Then the Blessed One addressed the brahman Sundarika Bhāradvāja in verse:

> "I'm not a brahman or king's son, > not a merchant, or anyone at all.[2] > Comprehending the clan > of the run-of-the-mill,[3]
> having nothing,
> I wander by means of wisdom
> in the world.
> Wearing my outer robe,

I wander without home,
    my hair   shaven off,
    my mind   entirely unbound,
not adhering to people here.
You ask me an inappropriate question about clan."

Sundarika:

"But, sir, brahmans surely inquire of brahmans,
'Are you among the brahmans?'"

The Buddha:

"If you say you're a brahman and I'm not a brahman,
I ask you the three lines of the Sāvitti and its twenty-four syllables."[4]

Sundarika:

"Because of what did seers, men, noble warriors, & brahmans —many of them here in the world—(first) arrange sacrifices to devas?"

The Buddha:

"Whoever has attained the end,
an attainer-of-knowledge,
should receive an oblation
at the time of a sacrifice, his (sacrifice), I say, would succeed."[5]

Sundarika:

"So yes, our sacrifice will succeed for we have seen an attainer-of-knowledge like you.
It's from not seeing those like you that someone else eats the sacrificial cake."

The Buddha:

"Therefore, brahman,
    as you are seeking your benefit,

approach and ask.
Perhaps you may find here one at peace, with no anger, no desire, no affliction:
one with good wisdom."

Sundarika:

"I delight in sacrifice,
I desire to sacrifice,
but I don't understand
where a sacrifice succeeds.
Teach me, sir. Tell me that."

The Buddha:

"In that case, brahman, lend ear.
I will teach you the Dhamma.
Don't inquire about birth.[6]
Inquire about conduct.
As from wood, a fire is born,[7] so a sage, even from lowly birth —steadfast, restrained through a sense of shame—becomes a thoroughbred.

One tamed by truth,
endowed with self-control, attained to the end of knowledge,
having fulfilled the holy life:
To him, at the right time,
you should bestow an offering,[8]
to him a brahman aiming at merit
should sacrifice.

Those with well-restrained minds,
straight as a shuttle:
To them, at the right time,
you should bestow an offering,
to them a brahman aiming at merit
should sacrifice.

Those devoid of passion,
their faculties well-centered,
released like the moon
from the grasp of an eclipse:
To them, at the right time,
you should bestow an offering,
to them a brahman aiming at merit
should sacrifice.

Unattached, they wander in the world,
always mindful,
abandoning possessiveness:
To them, at the right time,
you should bestow an offering,
to them a brahman aiming at merit
should sacrifice.

Who, abandoning sensuality, wanders victorious,
who knows the end
of birth & death,
totally unbound, cool
as a pool of water:
The Tathāgata deserves[2]
the sacrificial cake.

Consonant among the consonant, far from the discordant,
the Tathāgata of infinite discernment, not smeared here or beyond:
The Tathāgata deserves
the sacrificial cake.

In whom no deceptiveness dwells,
no conceit,
devoid of greed, unpossessive, un-
desiring,
his anger dispelled,

his mind entirely unbound, a brahman who has abandoned the stain of grief:
The Tathāgata deserves
the sacrificial cake.

He has abandoned the homes of the mind,
has no possessions at all,
        no clinging here or beyond:
The Tathāgata deserves
the sacrificial cake.

Centered, he's crossed
over the flood,
he knows the Dhamma
through the highest view, effluents ended, bearing his last body:
The Tathāgata deserves
the sacrificial cake.

Whose effluent of becoming and harsh speech
are destroyed, finished, do not exist—
he, an attainer-of-knowledge, everywhere totally released[10]:
The Tathāgata deserves
the sacrificial cake.

Gone beyond snares,
for whom there are no snares, who, among those attached to conceit, is unattached to conceit,
comprehending stress
along with its field & its site[11]:
The Tathāgata deserves
the sacrificial cake.

Independent of desire,
seeing seclusion,[12]

gone beyond the views known by others,
who has no supports no mental objects[13]
    at all:
The Tathāgata deserves
the sacrificial cake.

In whom, having understood them, phenomena from high to low
are destroyed, finished, do not exist[14]—
at peace, released in the ending of clinging:
The Tathāgata deserves
the sacrificial cake.

Seeing the end & ending of fetters & birth,
having dispelled the path of passion
without trace,
pure, faultless, stainless, clear:
The Tathāgata deserves
the sacrificial cake.

Who doesn't contemplate self by means of self,[15] centered, straightened, steadfast in mind,[16]
truly unperturbed,
free from rigidity, free
from doubt:
The Tathāgata deserves
the sacrificial cake.

Who has no conditions for delusion, with knowledge & vision of all phenomena he carries his last body, having attained the unexcelled self-awakening, auspicious—to that extent is the purity of a spirit[17]:

The Tathāgata deserves
the sacrificial cake."

Sundarika:

"And may my offering be a true offering
from having obtained
an attainer-of-knowledge like you.
As Brahmā is my witness, may the Blessed One accept,
may the Blessed One eat, my sacrificial cake."

The Buddha:

"What's been chanted over with verses[18]
shouldn't be eaten by me.
That's not the nature, brahman,
of one who's seen rightly.
What's been chanted over with verses
Awakened Ones reject.
That being their Dhamma, brahman,
this is their way of life.
Serve with other food & drink
a fully-perfected great seer,
his effluents ended,
his anxiety stilled,
for that is the field
for one looking for merit."

Sundarika:

"It's well, Blessed One, how I understand who should eat the offering of one like me, whom I should seek at the time of sacrifice having received your advice."

The Buddha:

"Whose violence is fully gone,
whose mind is limpid,
whose sloth is dispelled

—fully released from sensuality—one who has subdued boundaries,[19]
a master of birth & death,
a sage consummate in sagacity[20]:
When one like this has come to the sacrifice, then, subduing scorn, with hands palm-to-palm
over the heart,
do homage.
Worship him with food & drink.
In this way the offerings will succeed."

Sundarika:

"Master, the Awakened One, field of merit
unexcelled in all the world, recipient for all the world[21] deserves the sacrificial cake.
A gift given to you, master,
bears great fruit.

Then the brahman Sundarika Bhāradvāja said to the Blessed One, "Magnificent, Master Gotama! Magnificent! Just as if he were to place upright what was overturned, to reveal what was hidden, to show the way to one who was lost, or to carry a lamp into the dark so that those with eyes could see forms, in the same way has Master Gotama—through many lines of reasoning—made the Dhamma clear. I go to Master Gotama for refuge, to the Dhamma, & to the Saṅgha of monks. Let me obtain the Going-forth in Master Gotama's presence, let me obtain Acceptance (into the Bhikkhu Saṅgha)."

Then the brahman Sundarika Bhāradvāja obtained the Going-forth in the Blessed One's presence, he obtained Acceptance. And not long after his Acceptance—dwelling alone, secluded, heedful, ardent, & resolute—he in no long time reached & remained in the supreme goal of the holy life, for which clansmen rightly go forth from home into homelessness, knowing & realizing it for himself in the here-&-now. He knew: "Birth is ended, the holy life fulfilled, the task done. There is nothing further for the sake of this world." And so Ven. Sundarika Bhāradvāja became another one of the arahants.

vv. 456–486

Notes

1. The account in SN 7:9 goes immediately from this question to the Buddha's response marked by footnote 6.

2. See AN 4:36.

3. According to SnA, the "clan" of the run-of-the-mill is the five aggregates. However, the clan of run-of-the-mill people might also refer to the customs of all lineages that don't follow the customs of the noble lineage set out in AN 4:28.

4. This is apparently a reference to Ṛgveda iii, 62, 10, an invocation addressed to Sāvitrī, or the Sun:

> tat savitur vareṇ(i)yaṁ > bhargo devasya dhīmahi > dhiyo yo naḥ pracodayāt
>
> "Let us meditate on the glory > of the excellent deva Sāvitrī, > that he may inspire our thoughts."

This verse, in the Gāvitrī meter, is recited during the upanayana ceremony, when a young brahman is invested with the sacred thread that initiates him into the status of a "twice-born" brahman and he begins his study of the Vedas. Although similar passages were recited when young men of other castes began their education, Ṛgveda iii, 62, 10 was reserved exclusively for brahmans. It was also the subject of many meditations on its esoteric meaning, some of which can be found in the major Upaniṣads: Bṛhad-āraṇyaka 6.3.6; śvetāśvatara 4.18; and Maitrī 6.7 and 6.34.

SnA suggests that the Buddha's question about this verse surprises Sundarika, making him suspect that the Buddha knows more about brahmanical lore than he does, which is why he changes his tone with the following question. SnA also asserts that the Buddhist equivalent to the Sāvitti —three lines, 24 syllables—is the expression of homage to the Triple Gem: Buddhaṁ saraṇaṁ gacchāmi, Dhammaṁ saraṇaṁ gacchāmi, Saṅghaṁ saraṇaṁ gacchāmi.

5. In other words, the original motivation for performing sacrifices was that the recipient of the oblation would be a pure person. The Buddha gives another answer to a very similar question in Sn 5:3.

6. In SN 7:9, the Buddha's initial response to Sundarika begins here.

7. SnA explains this analogy by saying that it doesn't matter what kind of wood is used to make a fire, for in each case the fire is equally hot and bright. See MN 93.

8. In SN 7:9, the initial exchange between the Buddha and Sundarika ends here. Sundarika then offers the sacrificial cake to the Buddha, who refuses it with the passage beginning with the line marked by footnote 18. Then, as in Sn 1:4, he tells Sundarika to throw away the offering, which sizzles in the water into which it is thrown. Shocked, Sundarika returns to the Buddha, who teaches him five more verses of Dhamma.

> Don't, brahman, when lighting kindling, > imagine that purity comes from that outside, > for the skilled say that purity doesn't come through that:
> whoever searches outside for purity.
> Having abandoned the lighting of kindling, I, > brahman, ignite just the inner fire.
> Constantly afire,
> constantly centered in mind,
> I am a worthy one, living the holy life.
> Conceit, brahman, is the burden on your shoulder, > anger your smoke, false speech your ashes.
> The tongue is the ladle;
> the heart, the fire-altar;
> the well-tamed self
> is the fire of a man.
> The Dhamma is a lake > whose ford is virtue
> —limpid, praised by the good > to the good—
> where attainers-of-knowledge, having bathed > cross, dry-limbed,
> to the further shore.
> Truth, Dhamma, restraint, the holy life, attainment of Brahmā dependent on the middle:

Pay homage to those who've become truly straightened:
That, I call a man
in the flow of the Dhamma.

After hearing these verses, Sundarika asks for Acceptance into the Saṅgha, and the sutta concludes in the same way as the account given here.

9. This is a play on words: arahati, "deserves," is related to arahant.

10. On the implications of being "everywhere released," see The Paradox of Becoming, chapter 7.

11. According to SnA, the field and site of stress is a reference to defilements. It could also be a reference to the objects of clinging that can form a basis for stress: such things as the aggregates, sense media, and properties (dhātu).

12. According to SnA, "seclusion" here means unbinding. See SN 21:10 and SN 35:63.

13. Supports/mental objects = ārammaṇā. See Ud 8:1, SN 12:64, and SN 22:53.

14. On unbinding as the end of phenomena, see AN 10:58 and Sn 5:6.

15. For examples of seeing self by means of self (or self by means of not-self, or not-self by means of self), see MN 2.

16. This verse contains a play on words, in that attā can mean both "self" and "mind," and it is used in both senses here.

17. Spirit = yakkha. According to SnA, the word yakkha in this context means "person." See Sn 4:11, note 4.

18. See Sn 1:4.

19. Boundaries = sīmantā. According to SnA, this is an epithet for defilement, in that the territory (sīmā) stands for good manners, and the end of the territory, or boundary, (sīmanta) stands for the defilements that lie outside of the realm of good manners. For a very different meaning for "territory," see Sn 4:4, note 12.

20. See AN 3:123 and Sn 1:12.

21. The word, sabba-lokasmiṁ—"in all the world," "with regard to all the world"—apparently functions as a lamp in this verse.

3:5 Māgha

I have heard that on one occasion the Blessed One was staying near Rājagaha on Vulture Peak Mountain. Then the young brahman Māgha went to the Blessed One and, on arrival, exchanged courteous greetings with him. After an exchange of friendly greetings & courtesies, he sat to one side. As he was sitting there, he said to the Blessed One, "Master Gotama, I am generous, a master of giving, magnanimous, responsive to requests. I search for wealth righteously. Having searched for wealth righteously, then—with wealth righteously gained, righteously acquired—I give to one, I give to two, three, four, five, six, seven, eight, nine, ten, twenty, thirty, forty, fifty, one hundred, and to more. Thus giving, thus sacrificing, do I produce much merit?"

"Certainly, young man, thus giving, thus sacrificing, you produce much merit. Anyone who is generous, a master of giving, magnanimous, responsive to requests, who searches for wealth righteously and, having searched for wealth righteously, then—with wealth righteously gained, righteously acquired—gives to one, to two, three, four, five, six, seven, eight, nine, ten, twenty, thirty, forty, fifty, one hundred, and to more, produces much merit."

Then the young brahman Māgha addressed the Blessed One in verse:

> "I ask the magnanimous Gotama, > wearing ochre robes, wandering without home:
> When a householder responsive to requests,
> a master of giving,
> makes a sacrifice in hopes of merit,
> looking for merit,
> giving food & drink to others here,
> how is the offering purified > for the one making the sacrifice?"

The Buddha:

"When a householder responsive to requests,
a master of giving,
makes a sacrifice in hopes of merit,
looking for merit,
giving food & drink to others here:
Such a person achieves his aim in terms of the recipient."

Māgha:

"When a householder responsive to requests,
a master of giving,
makes a sacrifice in hopes of merit,
looking for merit,
giving food & drink to others here:
Point out to me the recipient."

The Buddha:

"Those who, unadhering,[1] wander in the world, having nothing, fully accomplished, their minds restrained:
To them, at the right time,
you should bestow an offering,
to them a brahman aiming at merit
should sacrifice.

Those who have cut all fetters & bonds, tamed, released, with
    no afflictions,
    no desires:
To them, at the right time,
you should bestow an offering,
to them a brahman aiming at merit
should sacrifice.

Those released from all fetters & bonds, tamed, released, with
    no afflictions,
    no desires:
To them, at the right time,

you should bestow an offering.

Having abandoned
passion, aversion, & delusion,
their holy life fulfilled,
their effluents ended:
To them, at the right time,
you should bestow an offering.

Those in whom no deceptiveness dwells,
no conceit,
their holy life fulfilled,
their effluents ended:
To them, at the right time,
you should bestow an offering.

Those devoid of greed,
unpossessive, undesiring,
their holy life fulfilled,
their effluents ended:
To them, at the right time,
you should bestow an offering.

Those who aren't prey to cravings, who wander without possessiveness,
having crossed over the flood:
To them, at the right time,
you should bestow an offering.

Those who, having abandoned sensuality, wander without home,
their minds well-restrained,
straight as a shuttle:
To them, at the right time,
you should bestow an offering.

Those devoid of passion,
their faculties well-centered,
released like the moon
from the grasp of an eclipse:
To them, at the right time,

you should bestow an offering.

Having calmed themselves,
those devoid of passion, unprovoked, who have no (future) destinations, having abandoned them here:
To them, at the right time,
you should bestow an offering.

Having abandoned birth & death
without trace,
they have escaped all perplexity:
To them, at the right time,
you should bestow an offering.

They who, with themselves as refuge, wander in the world,
having nothing, everywhere released:
To them, at the right time,
you should bestow an offering.

They who know here, as it really is—
'This is the last birth, there is no further becoming':
To them, at the right time,
you should bestow an offering.

An attainer-of-knowledge,[2] delighting in jhāna, mindful, attained to self-awakening, the refuge of many:
To him, at the right time,
you should bestow an offering,
to him a brahman aiming at merit
should sacrifice."

Māgha:

"Yes, my question was not in vain.
You, Blessed One, have pointed out the recipient.
You know this here, as it really is,
because this Dhamma has been experienced by you.

When a householder responsive to requests,
a master of giving,
makes a sacrifice in hopes of merit,
looking for merit,
giving food & drink to others here:
Point out to me, Blessed One,
the consummation of the sacrifice."

The Buddha:

"Sacrifice, and while sacrificing, Māgha, said the Blessed One,
make your mind clear everywhere.
For one sacrificing, the sacrifice is the object, the support.[3]
Taking a stand there, he abandons faults.[4]
He—devoid of passion, subduing aversion, developing a mind of goodwill immeasurable, day & night, continually heedful—should pervade all the directions immeasurably."

Māgha:

"Who is purified? Released? Bound?
By means of what mind does one go to the Brahmā world?
Say this, sage, when asked by me who doesn't know.
As the Blessed One is my witness,
I have seen Brahmā today,
for you are equal to Brahmā for us—it's true!
How, shining one, does one reappear in the Brahmā world?"

The Buddha:

"Whoever sacrifices
with the threefold sacrifice consummation,[5] such a one would achieve his aim

in terms of the recipient.
Having thus sacrificed rightly, one responsive to requests reappears, I say, in the Brahmā world."[5]

When this was said, the young brahman Māgha said to the Blessed One: "Magnificent, Master Gotama! Magnificent! Just as if he were to place upright what was overturned, to reveal what was hidden, to show the way to one who was lost, or to carry a lamp into the dark so that those with eyes could see forms, in the same way has Master Gotama—through many lines of reasoning—made the Dhamma clear. I go to Master Gotama for refuge, to the Dhamma, & to the Saṅgha of monks. May Master Gotama remember me as a lay follower who has gone for refuge from this day forward, for life."

vv. 487–509

Notes

1. Reading alaggā with the Thai edition. The Burmese and PTS editions read asattā, "without attachment."

2. In this verse, the Buddha is referring to himself.

3. Support/object = ārammaṇaṁ.

4. Dosa. There is apparently a play on words in this verse, with dosa meaning "fault" here, and "aversion" in the next line.

5. According to SnA, the threefold consummation of the sacrifice refers to the three qualities of the donor mentioned in AN 6:37: "The donor, before giving, is glad; while giving, his/her mind is bright & clear; and after giving, is gratified." However, because these qualities are not mentioned in this sutta, this explanation is unlikely. It's more likely that the Buddha here is referring to the three points he made just above: that the donor should make his/her mind clear; should abandon the faults of passion and aversion; and should develop immeasurable thoughts of goodwill. For more on the development of immeasurable goodwill and its benefits, see MN 97, AN 4:125–126, AN 10:196, and AN 11:16.

3:6 Sabhiya

I have heard that on one occasion the Blessed One was staying near Rājagaha in the Bamboo Forest, the Squirrels' Sanctuary. Now on that occasion, questions had been assigned to Sabhiya the wanderer by a devatā who was a former relative of his: "Sabhiya, if any contemplative or brahman, when asked these questions, answers them, live the holy life in his presence." Then Sabhiya the wanderer, having learned these questions in the presence of that devatā, went to those who had communities & groups, who were the teachers of groups, well-known, prestigious, founders of sects, well-regarded by people at large—i.e., Pūraṇa Kassapa, Makkhali Gosāla, Ajita Kesakambalin, Pakudha Kaccāyana, Sañjaya Velaṭṭhaputta, & the Nigaṇṭha Nāṭaputta—and asked them the questions. But they, being asked the questions by Sabhiya the wanderer, were unable to answer. Unable to answer, they showed anger, aversion, & displeasure, and even turned the questions back on Sabhiya the wanderer.

The thought occurred to Sabhiya the wanderer, "These venerable contemplatives & brahmans with communities & groups, who are the teachers of groups, well-known, prestigious, founders of sects, well-regarded by people at large—i.e., Pūraṇa Kassapa … & the Nigaṇṭha Nāṭaputta—when asked these questions by me are unable to answer. Unable to answer, they show anger, aversion, & displeasure, and even turn the questions back on me. What if I were to revert to the lower life and partake of sensual pleasures?"

But then the thought occurred to him, "There is still this Gotama the contemplative. He has a community & group, he is the teacher of a group, well-known, prestigious, founder of a sect, well-regarded by people at large. What if I, having gone to him, were to ask him these questions?"

Then the thought occurred to Sabhiya the wanderer, "Now, those venerable contemplatives & brahmans—Pūraṇa Kassapa … & the Nigaṇṭha Nāṭaputta—are old, elderly, aged, along in their years, at an advanced stage of life, elders, senior, long gone forth, with communities & groups, teachers of groups, well-known, prestigious, founders of sects, well-regarded by people at large: Even they, when asked these questions by me, were unable to answer. Unable to answer, they showed anger, aversion, & displeasure, and even turned the questions back on me. So how could this Gotama the contemplative answer when asked these questions? He is both young in age and newly gone forth."

But then the thought occurred to him, "Gotama the contemplative is not to be despised as 'young' or treated with contempt. Even though young, he is of great power & great might.[1] What if I, having gone to him, were to ask him these questions?"

So Sabhiya the wanderer set out, headed for Rājagaha. Wandering by stages, he arrived at where the Blessed One was staying near Rājagaha in the Bamboo Forest, the Squirrels' Sanctuary. On arrival, he exchanged courteous greetings with the Blessed One. After an exchange of friendly greetings & courtesies, he sat to one side. As he was sitting there, he addressed the Blessed One in verse:

"Doubtful & uncertain, I have come desiring to ask questions.
Put an end to them,
when asked them by me.
Answer me one-by-one,
in line with the Dhamma."

"Sabhiya," said the Blessed One,
"you have come from afar,
desiring to ask questions.
I will put an end to them,
when asked them by you.
I will answer you one-by-one,
in line with the Dhamma."

Then the thought occurred to Sabhiya the wanderer, "Isn't it amazing? Isn't it astounding?—how even the leave, of which I didn't receive even a little bit from other contemplatives & brahmans, has been granted to me by Gotama the contemplative." Gratified, joyful, exultant, enraptured, & happy, he asked the Blessed One a question:

"Having attained what
is one said to be a monk?
In what way is one composed?
And how is one said to be tamed?
How is one called 'awakened'?
Answer, Blessed One, when I've asked you."

The Buddha:

"Having gone to total unbinding, having crossed over doubt,
by means of the path accomplished by himself, having abandoned becoming & non-becoming,
having fulfilled [the task], further-becoming ended:
He is a monk.[2]

Everywhere equanimous, mindful, he harms no one in all the world.
A contemplative crossed over, limpid, he has no swellings[3]: He is composed.

Whose faculties are developed,
within & without,
with regard to all the world,[4] disenchanted with this world & the next, he awaits his time,[5] developed: He's tamed.

Having evaluated all theories,
the wandering-on,
dying & reappearing,
having done away with dust & blemish —pure—
he has attained the ending of birth:
He is called awakened."[6]

Then Sabhiya the wanderer—delighting in and approving of the Blessed One's words—gratified, joyful, exultant, enraptured & happy, asked the Blessed One a further question:

"Having attained what
is one said to be a brahman?
In what way is one a contemplative, and how is one 'washed'?
How is one called a nāga?
Answer, Blessed One, when I've asked you."

The Buddha:

"Having banished all evils,[7]
well-centered, stainless, firm in mind,
gone entirely beyond
the wandering-on,
independent, Such:
He's called a brahman.

Calmed, having abandoned
good & evil,
dustless, having known
this world & the next,
gone beyond birth & death, he is truly called a contemplative[8]—
Such.

Having washed off all evils within & without, in all the world, with regard to the theories of beings human & divine,
he goes to no theory:
He's said to be 'washed.'[9]

He does no misdeed[10]
at all in the world.
Having escaped all fetters & bonds, freed, he's everywhere unattached,
truly he's called a nāga—
Such."

Then Sabhiya the wanderer—delighting in and approving of the Blessed One's words—gratified, joyful, exultant, enraptured, & happy, asked the Blessed One a further question:

"Whom do the awakened
call a field-victor?
In what way is one skilled and how is one wise?
And how is one called by the name of 'sage'?
Answer, Blessed One, when I've asked you."

The Buddha:

"Having examined all fields[11]— heavenly, human, and fields of the Brahmās—freed from the root bonds of all fields, he's truly called a field-victor—
Such.

Having examined all storehouses[12]— heavenly, human, storehouses of Brahmās—freed from the root bonds of all storehouses, he's truly called skillful—
Such.

Having examined all white flowers[13]
within & without,
one of pure discernment gone beyond dark & bright, he's truly called wise—
Such.

Knowing false & true Dhamma
within & without, in all the world, he is worshipped by beings
human & divine.
Having transcended snares & nets,
he is a sage."

Then Sabhiya the wanderer—delighting in and approving of the Blessed One's words—gratified, joyful, exultant, enraptured & happy, asked the Blessed One a further question:

"Having attained what
is one said to be
an attainer-of-knowledge?
In what way is one well-tested, and how is one persistent?
Why is one named a thoroughbred?
Answer, Blessed One, when I've asked you."

The Buddha:

"Having examined all knowledges—those of brahmans, those of contemplatives—devoid of passion for all feelings,[14] gone beyond knowledge:
He's an attainer-of-knowledge.

Having tested objectification[15] & name-&-form,
within & without, the root of disease, freed from the root bond of disease, he's truly called well-tested—
Such.

Abstaining from all evils, gone beyond the suffering of hell, he's one with persistence.
He, with persistence, exertion, is rightly called a hero[16]—
Such.

One truly whose bonds are cut
within & without,
freed from all the root bonds of snares, truly he's called a thoroughbred—
Such."

Then Sabhiya the wanderer—delighting in and approving of the Blessed One's words—gratified, joyful, exultant, enraptured & happy, asked the Blessed One a further question:

"Having attained what
is one said to be learned?
In what way is one noble,
and how is one a person of good conduct?
Why is one named a wanderer?
Answer, Blessed One, when I've asked you."

The Buddha:

"Having heard, having directly known every Dhamma
for the sake of direct knowing[17]
in the world,
whatever is blameworthy or blameless, having conquered, free of doubt,
released
everywhere, everywhere
without trouble, one is said to be learned.[18]

Having cut attachments & effluents, knowing, he does not come to lie in the womb, dispelling mud
and the three types of perception,[19]
he goes to no theory:
He is called noble.

Whoever here has attained attainment with regard to good conduct, all-skillful, who has learned the Dhamma, unattached
everywhere,
everywhere his mind released,
he has no irritation:
He is one of good conduct.

Avoiding whatever action there is that ripens in suffering & stress —above, below, and even all around in the middle—
one who goes about, comprehending, he has put an all-around end to deceptiveness, conceit, greed, anger,
    name-&-form:
He's called a wanderer, attained to attainment."[20]

Then Sabhiya the wanderer—delighting in and approving of the Blessed One's words—gratified, joyful, exultant, enraptured & happy—got up from his seat and, arranging his upper robe over his shoulder and placing his hands palm-to-palm over his heart toward the Blessed One, praised the Blessed One face-to-face with fitting verses:

"One Deeply Discerning,
you have crossed over the flood of darkness of the three & sixty views leading downward,[21] dependent on the teachings of contemplatives, dependent on perceptions & words of perceptions.
You have gone to the end, you have gone to the further shore
of suffering & stress.
You are a noble one,
rightly self-awakened.
    I would imagine that you have ended the effluents.
Brilliant, thoughtful,
of abundant discernment,
ender of suffering,
you have brought me across.

When you learned of my doubt, you brought me across my uncertainty.

Homage to you, sage attained to the attainment of sagacity's ways.
Free from rigidity, Kinsman of the Sun, you're composed.

The doubt I had before,
you have answered, One with Eyes.
Yes, you are a sage, rightly self-awakened. You have no hindrances. Your despairs are fallen down, cut from the stem.
Cooled, attained to self-control, steadfast, enduring in truth:
In your words, Nāga of nāgas, great hero, all devas—including Nāradas and Pabbatas[22]—
delight.
Homage to you, O thoroughbred man,

Homage to you, O superlative man,[23]
in the world with its devas there's no one to compare with you.[24]
You : Awakened.
You : Teacher.
You : Sage who has conquered Māra.
You : Having cut obsessions,
having crossed over,
bring this generation across.
Your acquisitions transcended,
your effluents torn apart,
you are a lion
free of clinging,
your fear & terror abandoned.
As a lovely lotus
is not smeared by water, you are not smeared
by good or evil.

Extend your feet, hero:
Sabhiya venerates them,

the feet of the Teacher.[25]

Then Sabhiya the wanderer, bending his head to the Blessed One's feet, said, "Magnificent, lord! Magnificent! Just as if he were to place upright what was overturned, to reveal what was hidden, to show the way to one who was lost, or to set out a lamp in the darkness so that those with eyes could see forms, in the same way has the Blessed One—through many lines of reasoning—made the Dhamma clear. I go to the Blessed One for refuge, to the Dhamma, & to the Saṅgha of monks. Let me obtain the Going-forth in the Blessed One's presence, let me obtain Acceptance."

"Anyone, Sabhiya, who has previously belonged to another sect and who desires the Going-forth & Acceptance into this Dhamma & Vinaya, must first undergo probation for four months. If, at the end of four months, the monks feel so moved, they give him the Going-forth & accept him into the monk's state. But I know distinctions among individuals in this matter."

"Lord, if that is so, I am willing to undergo probation for four years. If, at the end of four years, the monks feel so moved, let them give me the Going-forth & accept me into the monk's state."

Then Sabhiya the wanderer obtained the Going-forth in the Blessed One's presence, he obtained Acceptance. And not long after his Acceptance—dwelling alone, secluded, heedful, ardent, & resolute—he in no long time reached & remained in the supreme goal of the holy life, for which clansmen rightly go forth from home into homelessness, knowing & realizing it for himself in the here-&-now. He knew: "Birth is ended, the holy life fulfilled, the task done. There is nothing further for the sake of this world." And so Ven. Sabhiya became another one of the arahants.

vv. 510–547

Notes

1. Reading Daharo'pi c'esa samaṇo Gotamo mahiddhiko hoti mahānbhavo, with the Burmese edition.

2. Many of the Buddha's answers to Sabhiya's questions involve verbal effects such as alliteration and rhyme. This verse contains a play on words, relating bhikkhu (monk) to bhavaṁ (becoming) and khīṇa- (ended).

3. Ussada: According to SnA, this means such forms of defilement as passion, aversion, delusion, pride, and conceit. See Sn 4:14.

4. In other words, one who is dispassionate to the sense faculties and their objects. See SN 35:153.

5. This is a reference to an image more fully elaborated in Thag 11 and Thag 14:1:

> I don't delight in death,
> don't delight in living.
> I await my time
> as a worker his wage.
> I don't delight in death,
> don't delight in living.
> I await my time,
> mindful, alert.

6. This verse contains an end-rhyme—visuddhaṁ/Buddhaṁ—which is rare in Pali poetry.

7. Here there is alliteration between bāhetvā (banished) and brahmā (brahman, shortened to fit the meter). A similar alliteration is found in Dhp 388 and Ud 1:4–5.

8. Here there is alliteration between samitāvi (calmed) and samaṇo (contemplative).

9. Here there is alliteration between n'eti, "doesn't come/go" and nhātako, "washed." This verse also contains a play on words. Normally, one would say that a person is washed of dirt (uklāpa); here the arahant is said to be washed of theory (kappa).

10. The Pali phrase here is āguṁ na karoti, which could be rephrased as na āguṁ karoti, yielding a play on the word nāga. The same play on words is found in AN 6:43. Given that one of the meanings of nāga is "large elephant," the verse here further elaborates on the image evoked by the word by depicting the nāga as freed from all fetters and bonds.

11. SnA cites this passage from AN 3:77 to identify "field," here, with kamma: "Kamma is the field, consciousness the seed, and craving the moisture." In the context of that sutta, this analogy is used to explain the way different levels of becoming are produced.

12. As with "field," SnA identifies "storehouses" as storehouses of kamma. Here there is alliteration between kosāni (storehouses) and kusalo (skillful).

13. Paṇḍara = Pāṇḍura (Skt.): Anogeissus Latifolia. According to SnA, "white flowers" stands for the six sense media, in that they are normally pure and yet can grow (see SN 22:54). An alternative possibility is that "white flowers" stands for states of mind marked by a perception of whiteness—such as the white-totality, and the mastery described in AN 10:29 as follows:

> "One percipient of the formless internally sees forms externally as white, white in their color, white in their features, white in their glow. Just as the morning star is white, white in its color, white in its features, white in its glow, or just as Vārāṇasī muslin, smooth on both sides, is white, white in its color, white in its features, white in its glow, in the same way one percipient of the formless internally sees forms externally as white, white in their color, white in their features, white in their glow. Mastering them, he is percipient of 'I know; I see.'"

As AN 10:29 further notes, this is the highest state of mastery, "yet even in the beings who are percipient in this way there is still aberration, there is change. Seeing this, the instructed disciple of the noble ones grows disenchanted with that. Being disenchanted with that, he becomes dispassionate toward what is supreme, and even more so toward what is inferior." As the verse here notes, a person going beyond this state would have to go beyond all states of darkness and brightness to attain release.

This verse contains an alliteration that can, without force, be replicated in English: white flowers (paṇḍarāni) and wise (paṇḍito).

14. Here there is a play on words with vedāni (knowledges) and vedanā (feelings).

15. See MN 18, introduction.

16. Reading vīro with GD, rather than dhīro, which is found in the printed editions but doesn't seem to fit the context. (See the note in GD to verse 44 in Sn 1:3, which comments on the tendency of the textual tradition to confuse these two words.) This reading would give the verse three alliterated words: virato (abstaining), viriyavā (one with persistence), and vīro (hero).

17. "Having directly known, for the sake of direct knowing": Two meanings of the word abhiññāya.

18. Here there is an alliteration between sutavā (having heard) and sottiyo (learned).

19. SnA identifies "mud" as the strings of sensuality, and the three types of perception as the three beginning with the perception of sensuality. These could be either the perceptions of sensuality, ill-will, and harmfulness, or the perceptions of sensuality, form, and formlessness.

The alliteration in this verse is between ālayāni (attachments) and ariyo (noble).

20. This verse contains an alliteration between paribbājayitvā (avoiding) and paribbājaka (wanderer).

21. According to SnA, the 63 wrong views comprise the 62 wrong views mentioned in DN 1 along with the wrong view of self-identity (sakkāya-diṭṭhi).

22. According to SnA, these are classes of devas noted for their discernment.

23. See AN 11:10.

24. See Iti 112.

25. The word "feet"—pāde—functions as a lamp here.

3:7 Sela

(This sutta is identical with MN 92. Part of it also appears in Mv VI.35.1–8.)

I have heard that on one occasion, while the Blessed One was wandering on a tour among the Aṅguttarāpans with a large Saṅgha of monks, approximately 1,250 monks in all, he arrived at an Aṅguttarāpan town named Āpaṇa. Keṇiya the coiled hair ascetic heard it said, "Gotama the contemplative—a son of the Sakyans, gone forth from the Sakyan clan—on a wandering tour among the Aṅguttarāpans with a large Saṅgha of monks, approximately 1,250 monks in all—has arrived at Āpaṇa. And of that Master Gotama this fine reputation has spread: 'He is indeed a Blessed One, worthy & rightly self-awakened, consummate in clear-knowing & conduct, well-gone, an expert with regard to the cosmos, unexcelled trainer of people fit to be tamed, teacher of devas & human beings, awakened, blessed. He makes known—having realized it through direct knowledge—this world with its devas, Māras, & Brahmās, this generation with its contemplatives & brahmans, its rulers & commonfolk; he explains the Dhamma admirable in the beginning, admirable in the middle, admirable in the end; he expounds the holy life both in its particulars & in its essence, entirely perfect, surpassingly pure. It is good to see such a worthy one.'"

So Keṇiya the coiled-hair ascetic went to the Blessed One and, on arrival, exchanged courteous greetings with him. After an exchange of friendly greetings & courtesies, he sat to one side.[1] As he was sitting there, the Blessed One instructed, urged, roused, & encouraged him with a talk on Dhamma. Then Keṇiya the coiled-hair ascetic—instructed, urged, roused, & encouraged with the Blessed One's talk on Dhamma—said to him, "Master Gotama, may the Blessed One acquiesce to my meal tomorrow, together with the Saṅgha of monks."

When this was said, the Blessed One said to him, "The Saṅgha of monks is large, Keṇiya, approximately 1,250 monks in all, and you are strongly confident in brahmans."

A second time… A third time, Keṇiya the coiled-hair ascetic said to the Blessed One, "Master Gotama, even though the Saṅgha of monks is large, approximately 1,250 monks in all, and I am strongly confident in brahmans, may Master Gotama acquiesce to my meal tomorrow, together with the Saṅgha of monks."

The Blessed One acquiesced with silence.

Then Keṇiya the coiled-hair ascetic, understanding the Blessed One's acquiescence, got up from his seat and returned to his own ashram. On arrival, he addressed his friends & companions, his relatives & kinsmen: "Listen to me, venerable friends & companions, relatives & kinsmen: I have invited Gotama the contemplative together with a Saṅgha of monks, approximately 1,250 monks in all, for the meal tomorrow. Give me bodily assistance for that."

"As you say, master," his friends & companions, relatives & kinsmen responded to him. Some of them dug out ovens, some split wood, some washed dishes, some set out a water pot, some arranged seats, while Keṇiya the coiled-hair ascetic arranged a pavilion of garlands himself.

Now on that occasion Sela the brahman was staying at Āpaṇa. He was a master of the Three Vedas with their vocabularies, liturgy, phonology, etymology, & histories as a fifth; skilled in philology & grammar, he was fully versed in cosmology and in the marks of a Great Man. He was instructing 300 young brahmans in the (Vedic) mantras. Then, as he—surrounded by 300 young brahmans—was walking and wandering about to exercise his legs, he arrived at the ashram of Keṇiya the coiled-hair ascetic. He saw that some of the people in the ashram were digging out ovens, some were splitting wood… while Keṇiya the coiled-hair ascetic was arranging a pavilion of garlands himself. On seeing this, he said to Keṇiya the coiled-hair ascetic, "Could it be that Keṇiya the coiled-hair ascetic is giving a son or daughter in marriage, or is he setting up a great sacrifice, or is Seniya Bimbisāra, the king of Magadha, invited for tomorrow together with his army?"

"No, Sela, it's not that I'm giving a son or daughter in marriage, nor that Seniya Bimbisāra, the king of Magadha, is invited for tomorrow together with his army. But I am setting up a great sacrifice. There is Gotama the contemplative—a son of the Sakyans, gone forth from the Sakyan clan—who, on a wandering tour among the Aṅguttarāpans with a large Saṅgha of monks, approximately 1,250 monks in all, has arrived at Āpaṇa. And of that Master Gotama this fine reputation has spread: 'He is indeed a Blessed One, worthy & rightly self-awakened, consummate in clear-knowing & conduct, well-gone, an expert with regard to the cosmos, unexcelled trainer of people fit to be tamed, teacher of devas & human beings, awakened, blessed.' He has been invited by me for the meal tomorrow, together with the Saṅgha of monks."

"Did you say, 'Awakened,' master Keṇiya?"

"I said, 'Awakened,' master Sela."

"Did you say, 'Awakened,' master Keṇiya?"

"I said, 'Awakened,' master Sela."

Then the thought occurred to Sela the brahman, "Even just this word is hard to come by in the world: 'Awakened.' Now, these 32 marks of a Great Man have come down in our mantras. For a Great Man endowed with them, two future courses, and no other, exist. If he inhabits a home, he will become a wheel-turning king, righteous, a king through righteousness, a conqueror of the four quarters, a stabilizer of his countryside endowed with the seven treasures. The seven treasures are these: the wheel-treasure, the elephant-treasure, the horse-treasure, the jewel-treasure, the woman-treasure, the householder-treasure, and the adviser-treasure as the seventh. He will have a thousand sons, valiant, heroic in body, crushers of enemy armies. He will dwell, having conquered the earth to the edge of the sea, by means of Dhamma, without rod, without sword. But if he goes forth from the home life into homelessness, he will become a worthy one, rightly self-awakened, with his roof opened in the world."[2]

"Master Keṇiya, where is he staying now, that Master Gotama, worthy & rightly self-awakened?"

When this was said, Keṇiya the coiled-hair ascetic lifted his right arm and said to Sela the brahman, "There, by the dark green line of the forest."

Then Sela the brahman, together with the 300 young brahmans, headed toward the Blessed One. Then he addressed the young brahmans, “Come noiselessly, masters, placing a footstep in a footstep. These Blessed Ones are hard to approach, like a lion wandering alone. And when I engage Gotama the contemplative in counsel, don’t break into the middle of my talk. Wait until the end of my talk.”

Then Sela the brahman went to the Blessed One and, on arrival, exchanged courteous greetings with him. After an exchange of friendly greetings & courtesies, he sat to one side. As he was sitting there, he looked for the 32 marks of a Great Man in the Blessed One’s body. He saw most of the 32 marks of a Great Man in the Blessed One’s body, except for two. About the two marks he was doubtful, uncertain, undecided, and wasn’t reassured: about the male organ being in a sheath, and about the size of the tongue.

The thought occurred to the Blessed One, “Sela the brahman sees most of my marks of a Great Man, except for two. About the two marks he is doubtful, uncertain, undecided, and isn’t reassured: about the male organ being in a sheath, and about the size of the tongue.” So the Blessed One willed a willing of power such that Sela the brahman saw that the Blessed One’s male organ was in a sheath. And then, extending his tongue, the Blessed One licked both ear-holes and nostrils back and forth, and covered his whole forehead with his tongue.

The thought occurred to Sela the brahman, “Gotama the contemplative’s 32 marks of a Great Man are complete and not incomplete. But I don’t know whether he is awakened or not. Still, I have heard the aged line of teachers, along in their years, say that Blessed Ones, worthy & rightly self-awakened, reveal themselves when their praise is spoken. What if I were to praise Gotama the contemplative face-to-face with fitting verses?”

So Sela the brahman praised the Blessed One face-to-face with fitting verses:

> “Perfect your body, shining well, > well-born, lovely to look at,
> Blessed One, you have a golden complexion, > you have white teeth, you’re vigorous.
> The characteristics of a well-born man,
> the marks of a Great Man,

are all present in your body.
Clear your eyes, good your face, imposing, splendid, straight upright:
    In the midst of a community of contemplatives you shine like the sun.
A monk with skin resembling gold is admirable to look at,
but what use is the contemplative state for you, so superlative in appearance?
You deserve to be a king,
a wheel-turner,[3] lord of charioteers, conqueror of the four quarters, sovereign lord of the Jambu grove.[4] Noble warriors, feudal lords, & kings are your devotees.
King of kings, monarch of human beings:
    Rule, Gotama!"

The Buddha:

"I am a king, Sela:
a Dhamma king unexcelled.
I turn the wheel with Dhamma—the wheel whose turning can't be stopped."

Sela:

"You claim to be rightly self-awakened,
a Dhamma king unexcelled.
But who, master, is your general,
the disciple right below the teacher?
    Who keeps rolling
the Dhamma-wheel set rolling by you?"

The Buddha:

"The wheel set rolling by me
the unexcelled Dhamma-wheel: Sāriputta keeps it rolling taking after the Tathāgata.[5] What should be directly known has been directly known, what should be developed, developed,

what should be abandoned, abandoned[6]:
    Therefore, I'm awakened, brahman.
Subdue your doubt about me.
Be decided, brahman.
It's hard often to gain sight of the Rightly Self-Awakened.
    I am one whose appearance in the world
    is hard often to gain:
Rightly Self-Awakened,
an arrow-remover unexcelled.
Brahmā-become, without compare,
crusher of Māra's armies, having overmastered all enemies,
    I rejoice, with no fear from anywhere."

Sela (to his following):

"Observe carefully, masters, how he speaks, this One with Eyes, arrow-remover, great hero:
He roars like a lion in the forest.
Brahmā-become, without compare,
crusher of Māra's armies:
    Who,
even one of a dark birth,[7]
on seeing him,
    would not have confidence?
Whoever wants to may follow me.
Whoever doesn't may go.
I will here go forth
in the presence of the one
of foremost discernment."

Sela's following:

"If, master, you thus delight in the message
of the Rightly Self-Awakened One, we, too, will here go forth
in the presence of the one
of foremost discernment."

Sela:

"These three hundred brahmans request, with hands palm-to-palm
over the heart:
We will follow the holy-life,
Blessed One, in your presence."

The Buddha:

"The holy-life is well-expounded, to be seen here-&-now, timeless, where the Going-forth is not in vain for a heedful person who trains."

Then Sela the brahman, together with his following, obtained the Going-forth in the Blessed One's presence, he obtained Acceptance.

Then, as the night was ending, Keṇiya the coiled-hair ascetic, having had choice staple & non-staple foods prepared in his own ashram, announced the time to the Blessed One, "It is time, master Gotama. The meal is ready."

Then, early in the morning, the Blessed One—after adjusting his lower robe and carrying his bowl & outer robe—went together with a Saṅgha of monks to Keṇiya's ashram. On arrival, he sat down on an arranged seat. Keṇiya the coiled-hair ascetic, with his own hand, served & satisfied the Blessed One & the Saṅgha of monks with choice staple & non-staple foods. Then, when the Blessed One had eaten and had rinsed his bowl & hands, Keṇiya the coiled-hair ascetic took a lower seat and sat to one side. As he was sitting there, the Blessed One expressed approval of him with these verses:

"The fire oblation is the chief of sacrifices, the Sāvitti, the chief of Vedic hymns,[8] a king, chief among human beings, the ocean, chief among rivers,

the moon, chief of the zodiac stars, the sun, chief of things that burn,[9]
and for those who sacrifice, wishing for merit, the Saṅgha, truly,
  is chief.

Then, having expressed approval of Keṇiya the coiled-hair ascetic with these verses, the Blessed One got up from his seat and left.

Then Ven. Sela, together with his following—dwelling alone, secluded, heedful, ardent, & resolute—in no long time reached & remained in the supreme goal of the holy life, for which clansmen rightly go forth from home into homelessness, knowing & realizing it for himself in the here-&-now. He knew: "Birth is ended, the holy life fulfilled, the task done. There is nothing further for the sake of this world." And so Ven. Sela, together with his following, became another one of the arahants.

Then Ven. Sela, together with his following, went to the Blessed One and, on arrival, arranging his upper robe over one shoulder and extending his hands palm-to-palm over the heart toward the Blessed One, addressed him in verse:

"This is the eighth day since coming for refuge,
One with Eyes.
Blessed One,
for seven nights,
we have tamed ourselves
with your message.
  You : Awakened.
  You : Teacher.
  You : Sage who has conquered Māra.
  You : Having cut obsessions,
  having crossed over,
  bring this generation across.
Your acquisitions transcended,

your effluents torn apart,
    you are a lion
    free of clinging,
your fear & terror abandoned.
These three hundred monks stand with hands palm-to-palm
over the heart.
Extend your feet, hero:
The nāgas venerate them,
    the feet of the Teacher."[10]

vv. 548–573

Notes

1. According to Mv VI.35.3, at this point in the narrative Keṇiya offered a juice drink to the Buddha, who told him also to offer the drink to the Saṅgha. This became the occasion for the allowance for monks to consume juice drinks after noon.

2. See Sn 1:2, note 3.

3. To be a wheel-turner meant, in ancient Indian parlance, to establish rule over the entire "wheel" of the eight directions. The sutta containing the Buddha's first sermon (SN 56:11), in stating that the sermon set the Dhamma-wheel rolling, thus borrowed this image to make the point that the Buddha's Dhamma ruled in all directions.

The Dhamma-wheel is also a wheel in another sense. In ancient Indian texts, a "wheel" was a list of a permutations of two or more variables. The Dhamma-wheel in the Buddha's first sermon lists all twelve permutations of two variables: the four noble truths—stress, its origination, its cessation, and the way leading to its cessation—and the three levels of knowledge appropriate to each truth: knowledge of the truth, knowledge of the task appropriate to the truth, and knowledge that the task has been completed.

4. An epithet for the Indian subcontinent.

5. See MN 141. MLDB, in its translation of this verse in MN 92, mistakenly says that Sāriputta will keep the Dhamma wheel rolling; GD mistakenly identifies him as the Buddha's successor, rather than as the disciple right below him. Translations of this sort have led at least one scholar to cite this verse as a late addition to the Canon, in conflict with MN 108, which clearly states that the Buddha left no successor, and with SN 47:13, which notes that Sāriputta passed away before the Buddha. However, when the verse is correctly translated, there is no conflict.

6. Three of the four duties with regard to the four noble truths. See SN 56:11 and MN 149.

7. Sela, despite his newfound confidence in the Buddha, has not yet abandoned his racism. In AN 4:85, however, the Buddha redefines the brahmanical concept of dark birth in such a way that is based on kamma rather than race.

8. Chandas. This term normally means "meter," but it also means Vedic hymn. See the discussion in The Buddhist Monastic Code, volume II, chapter 8. On the Sāvitti as the chief Vedic hymn, see Sn 3:4, note 4.

9. See Dhp 387.

10. See Sn 3:6, note 25.

3:8 The Arrow

Without sign,
unknown
—the life here of mortals—difficult,
short,
tied up with pain.
For there's no way
by which those who are born will not die.
Beings are subject
to death
even when they attain
old age.

Like ripe fruits
whose downfall, whose danger is falling,
so for mortals, once born,
the constant danger
is death.

As clay vessels made by a potter
all end up broken,
so too life
heads to death.[1]
Young & old
wise & foolish:
All
come under the sway of death;
all
have death as their end.

For those overcome by death, gone to the other world,

father cannot shelter son,
nor relatives a relative.
See: Even while relatives are looking on,
wailing heavily,
mortals are
one
by one led away
like cows to the slaughter.
In this way is the world afflicted with aging & death,
and so the enlightened don't grieve, knowing the way of the world.

"You don't know the path
of his coming or going:
seeing neither end,
you lament in vain."[2]

If, by lamenting,
—confused,
harming yourself—
any use could be gained the prudent would do it as well.
But not by weeping & grief do you gain peace of awareness.
Pain
arises all the more. Your body is harmed.
You grow thin,
pale,
harming yourself
by yourself.
Not in that way
are the dead protected.
Lamentation's in vain.

Not abandoning grief, a person suffers all the more pain.
Bewailing one whose time is done,
you fall under the sway of grief.

Look at others
going along,
    people arriving
in line with their actions:
    falling under the sway of death, beings simply shivering here.

For however they imagine it, it always turns out
    other than that.
That's the type of (their) separation.
    See the way of the world.

Even if a person lives a century —or more—
he's parted
from his community of relatives, he abandons his life
right here.

So, having heard the arahant,
subduing lamentation,
seeing the dead one whose time is done, [think,] "I can't fetch him back."[3]
Just as one would put out
    a burning refuge
    with water,
so does the enlightened one—
    discerning,
    skillful,
    & wise—
blow away any arisen grief,
like the wind, a bit of cotton fluff.

Seeking your own happiness,
you should pull out your own arrow:
    your own
                lamentation,
                longing,
                & sorrow.[4]
With arrow pulled out,
        independent,
attaining peace of awareness,
all grief transcended, griefless you are
        unbound.

vv. 574–593

Notes

1. See the verse at the end of DN 16, part III.
2. See Thig 6:1.
3. These lines can also be translated as follows:

    So, having heard the arahant,
    subdue lamentation,
    seeing the dead one whose time is done,
        [and thinking,] "I can't fetch him back."

4. These lines can also be translated as follows:

    Just as one would put out
        a burning refuge
        with water,
    so does the enlightened one—
        discerning,
        skillful,
        & wise—
    blow away any arisen grief,
    his own lamentation, longing, & sorrow,
    like the wind, a bit of cotton fluff.
    Seeking your own happiness,

you should pull out your own arrow.

3:9 Vāseṭṭha

(This sutta is identical with MN 98.)

I have heard that on one occasion the Blessed One was staying at Icchānaṅgala in the Icchānaṅgala forest grove. And on that occasion many well-known wealthy brahmans were dwelling in Icchānaṅgala, i.e., Caṅkī the brahman, Tārukkha the brahman, Pokkharasāti the brahman, Jānusoṇin the brahman, Todeyya the brahman, and many other well-known wealthy brahmans.

Then, while the young brahmans Vāseṭṭha and Bhāradvāja were walking and wandering about to exercise their legs, this conversation arose between them: "How is one a brahman?"

The young brahman Bhāradvāja said, "When one is well-born on both sides, the mother's & the father's, is of pure descent for seven generations of fathers—uncriticized & irreproachable in the telling of one's birth: It's to that extent that one is a brahman."

The young brahman Vāseṭṭha said, "When one is virtuous & consummate in one's practices, it's to that extent that one is a brahman."

But neither was the young brahman Bhāradvāja able to win over the young brahman Vāseṭṭha, nor was the young brahman Vāseṭṭha able to win over the young brahman Bhāradvāja.

Then the young brahman Vāseṭṭha said to the young brahman Bhāradvāja, "Bhāradvāja, this Gotama the contemplative—a son of the Sakyans, gone forth from the Sakyan clan—is staying at Icchānaṅgala in the Icchānaṅgala forest grove. And of that Master Gotama this fine reputation has spread: 'He is indeed a Blessed One, worthy & rightly self-awakened, consummate in clear-knowing & conduct, well-gone, an expert with regard to the cosmos, unexcelled trainer of people fit to be tamed, teacher of devas & human beings, awakened, blessed.' Come, let's go to Gotama the contemplative and, on arrival, ask him about this matter. However he answers, that's how we'll hold it."

"As you say, master," the young brahman Bhāradvāja responded to the young brahman Vāseṭṭha. So the young brahmans Vāseṭṭha and Bhāradvāja went to the Blessed One and, on arrival, exchanged courteous greetings with him. After an exchange of friendly greetings & courtesies, they sat to one side. As they were sitting there, the young brahman Vāseṭṭha addressed the Blessed One in verses:

Master, we're acknowledged & self-proclaimed as masters of the three knowledges[1]:
I, a student of Pokkharasāti, this one, of Tārukka.
Whatever is taught
by masters of the three knowledges, in that we are adept—grammarians & philologists, on a par with our teachers in recitation.

We have a dispute, Gotama, on the topic of birth.
Bhāradvāja says that one is a brahman through birth,
I say through action.[2]
Know this, One with Eyes.
Neither of us can win over the other.
We come, asking the master reputed to be self-awakened.
As people going with hands palm-to-palm over the heart pay homage, venerating
the moon when it's just past new,
in the same way in the world, Gotama, we ask Gotama, the Eye arisen in the world:
Is one a brahman through birth or is it through action?
Tell us, who don't know, how we might know a brahman."

The Buddha:

“I will answer you step-by-step as it really is.
Animals are divided by nature,
    for their species differ, one from another.[3]
You know grasses & trees, even though they don’t proclaim themselves:
Their distinguishing markings are made by nature,
    for their species differ, one from another.
Then beetles & moths, down to white ants:
Their distinguishing markings are made by nature,
    for their species differ, one from another.
You know four-footed beasts, small & large:
Their distinguishing markings are made by nature,
    for their species differ, one from another.
You know belly-footed, long-backed snakes:
Their distinguishing markings are made by nature,
    for their species differ, one from another.
Then you know fish in the water, with water their range:
Their distinguishing markings are made by nature,
    for their species differ, one from another.
Then you know birds, with wings as their vehicles, coursing through the sky:
Their distinguishing markings are made by nature,
    for their species differ, one from another.

While these species
have many distinguishing marks
made by nature,
human beings   don’t
have many distinguishing marks
made by nature:
not through hair or head
    not through ears or eyes, not through face or nose,
    not through mouth or lips,
not through neck or shoulders,

not through belly or back,
not through buttocks or chest, not through groin or intercourse, not through hands or feet,
not through fingers or nails,
not through calves or thighs,
not through complexion or voice.
Their distinguishing mark is not made by nature as it is for other species.
In human beings that's not found individually in their bodies, but their identification is described in terms of convention:
Whoever, among human beings,
makes a living by guarding cows,
you know him thus, Vāseṭṭha,
as a farmer, not as a brahman.
Whoever, among human beings,
makes a living through various crafts,
you know him thus, Vāseṭṭha,
as a craftsman, not as a brahman.
Whoever, among human beings,
makes a living through trade,
you know him thus, Vāseṭṭha,
as a merchant, not as a brahman.
Whoever, among human beings,
makes a living by serving others,
you know him thus, Vāseṭṭha,
as a servant, not as a brahman.
Whoever, among human beings,
makes a living through stealing,
you know him thus, Vāseṭṭha:
This is a thief, not a brahman.
Whoever, among human beings,
makes a living through arrow & sword,
you know him thus, Vāseṭṭha,
as a soldier, not as a brahman.

Whoever, among human beings,
makes a living through priesthood,
you know him thus, Vāseṭṭha,
    as a sacrificer, not as a brahman.
Whoever, among human beings,
makes a living partaking of city & state,
you know him thus, Vāseṭṭha,
    as a king, not as a brahman.

I don't call one a brahman
for being born of a mother
or sprung from a womb.
He's called a 'bho-sayer'
if he has anything at all.
But someone with nothing,
who clings to no thing:
    He's what I call
    a brahman.[4]
Having cut every fetter,
he doesn't get ruffled.
Beyond attachment,
unshackled:
    He's what I call
    a brahman.
Having cut the strap & thong,
    cord & bridle,
having thrown off the bar,[5]
    awakened:
    He's what I call
    a brahman.
He endures—unangered—
insult, assault, & imprisonment.
His army is strength;
his strength, forbearance:
    He's what I call
    a brahman.
Free from anger,

duties observed,
principled, with no overbearing pride,
trained, a 'last-body':
    He's what I call
    a brahman.[6]
Like water   on a lotus leaf,
a mustard seed   on the tip of an awl,
he doesn't adhere   to sensual pleasures:
    He's what I call
    a brahman.
He discerns right here,
    for himself,
    on his own,
    his own
    ending of stress.[7]
Unshackled, his burden laid down:
    He's what I call
    a brahman.
Wise, deeply discerning, astute
as to what is the path
& what's not;
his ultimate goal attained:
    He's what I call
    a brahman.
Uncontaminated
by householders
& houseless ones alike;
living with no home,
with next to no wants:
    He's what I call
    a brahman.
Having put aside violence against beings fearful or firm,
he neither kills nor
gets others to kill:
    He's what I call

a brahman.
Unopposing among opposition, unbound among the armed,
unclinging among those who cling:
He's what I call
a brahman.
His passion, aversion,
conceit, & contempt,
have fallen away—
like a mustard seed
from the tip of an awl:
He's what I call
a brahman.
He would say
what's non-grating,
instructive,
true—
abusing no one:
He's what I call
a brahman.
Here in the world
he takes nothing not-given
—long, short,
large, small,
attractive, not:
He's what I call
a brahman.
His longing for this & for the next world
can't be found;
free from longing, unshackled:
He's what I call
a brahman.
His attachments,
his homes,
can't be found.

He, through knowing,[8]
is unperplexed,
has reached a footing
in the deathless[9]:
He's what I call
a brahman.
He has gone
beyond attachment here
for both merit & evil—
sorrowless, dustless, & pure:
He's what I call
a brahman.
Spotless, pure like the moon
—limpid & calm—
his delights, his becomings,
totally gone:
He's what I call
a brahman.
He has made his way past
this hard-going path:
delusion, wandering-on.
He's crossed over,
has gone beyond,
is free from want,
from perplexity,
absorbed in jhāna,
through no-clinging
unbound:
He's what I call
a brahman.
Whoever, abandoning sensual passions here,
would go forth from home—
his sensual passions, becomings,
totally gone:
He's what I call
a brahman.
Whoever, abandoning craving here,

would go forth from home—
his cravings, becomings,
totally gone:
He's what I call
a brahman.
Having left behind
the human bond,
having made his way past
the divine,
from all bonds unshackled:
He's what I call
a brahman.
Having left behind
delight & displeasure,
cooled, with no acquisitions—
a hero who has conquered
all the world,
every world:
He's what I call
a brahman.
He knows in every way
beings' passing away,
and their re-
arising;
unattached, awakened,
well-gone:
He's what I call
a brahman.
He whose course they don't know
—devas, gandhabbas, & human beings[10]—
his effluents ended, an arahant:
He's what I call
a brahman.
He who has nothing
—in front, behind, in between—
the one with nothing
who clings to no thing:

He's what I call
a brahman.
A splendid bull, conqueror,
hero, great seer—
free from want,
awakened, washed:
He's what I call
a brahman.
He knows his former lives.
He sees heavens & states of woe,
has attained the ending of birth[11]:

He's what I call
a brahman.

For this is a convention in the world:
the name & clan determined,
come into being from common consent, here & there determined.
Taking a position unknowingly for a long time obsessively, those who don't know
say that one is a brahman by birth.
Not by birth is one a brahman, not by birth a non-brahman.
By action is one a brahman.
By action one is a non-brahman.
By action is one a farmer.
By action one is a craftsman.
By action is one a merchant.
By action one is a servant.
By action is one a thief.
By action one is a soldier.
By action is one a sacrificer.
By action one is a king.
The wise see action in this way
as it has come to be,
seeing dependent co-arising,

cognizant of action's results.
Through action the world rolls on.
People roll on through action.
In action are beings held bound together,
as in a linchpin,
a chariot traveling along.

Through austerity, the holy life, through restraint & self-control:
That's how one is a brahman.
That's a brahman
unexcelled.

Consummate in the three knowledges,[12] further-becoming ended, at peace: Know, Vāseṭṭha: That's Brahmā, that's Sakka,[13] for those who directly know."

When this was said, the young brahmans Vāseṭṭha & Bhāradvāja said to the Blessed One: "Magnificent, Master Gotama! Magnificent! Just as if he were to place upright what was overturned, to reveal what was hidden, to show the way to one who was lost, or to carry a lamp into the dark so that those with eyes could see forms, in the same way has Master Gotama—through many lines of reasoning—made the Dhamma clear. We go to Master Gotama for refuge, to the Dhamma, & to the Saṅgha of monks. May Master Gotama remember us as lay followers who have gone for refuge from this day forward, for life."

vv. 594–656

Notes

1. In the Brahmanical tradition, this means the three Vedas. Later in this poem, the Buddha will give "three knowledges" a Buddhist definition.

2. In this context, Vāseṭṭha is referring to action in this lifetime, rather than action in previous lifetimes.

3. In this and the following verses, the Buddha is playing with three meanings of the word jāti: birth, species, and nature. This point becomes clear when he later contrasts these natural distinctions in the animal world with the conventional distinctions in the human world.

4. This verse begins a section where the verses are identical with Dhp 396–423, except that the last verse in the series is missing a line present in Dhp 423: "He is a sage who has mastered full-knowing, his mastery totally mastered."

This section redefines "brahman" to mean an arahant (although see note 9, below).

As for "bho-sayer": Brahmans, when surprised or amazed, tended to use the word bho, or master, as an exclamation. "If he has anything" (reading sa ce with the Burmese and Sri Lankan editions) = if he/she lays claim to anything as his/her own.

5. The three commentaries explaining this verse—SnA, MA, and DhpA—treat these symbols in slightly different ways. They all agree that the strap = hatred and the thong = craving. As for the remaining symbols, MA simply states that cord = views, bridle = view-obsession, and bar = ignorance.

SnA and DhpA, however, try to make more of the image by exploring the interconnections of the chariot parts. In their explanation, cord = 62 wrong views (listed in the Brahmajāla Sutta, DN 1) and bridle = obsessions (sensuality, becoming, anger, conceit, views, uncertainty, ignorance (AN 7:11-12)). They note the connection between the 62 wrong views and the obsessions (one of which is views), which is apparently similar to the way the cord and bridle are connected. They go on to note that when one has cut all these things, the bar, which equals ignorance, has been lifted. The fact that the cutting of these chariot parts automatically accomplishes the lifting of the bar is apparently symbolic of the fact that ignorance is one of the obsessions.

6. "With no overbearing pride": reading anussadaṁ with the Thai, Burmese, and Sri Lankan editions. "Last-body": Because an arahant will not be reborn, this present body is his/her last.

7. "For himself, on his own, his own ending of stress": three different ways that the one word attano functions in this verse.

8. According to SnA, "attachments/homes (ālaya)" = cravings. "Knowing": the knowledge of full Awakening (aññā).

9. "A footing in the deathless": The image here derives from a standard analogy comparing the practice to the act of crossing a river. According to AN 7:15, the point where the meditator gains footing on the river bottom, but before getting up on the bank, corresponds to the third stage of awakening, the attainment of non-return. To reach the fourth stage, becoming an arahant, is to go beyond the river and stand on firm ground. Either this verse is using the image differently, equating the gaining of a footing with arahantship, or else it is the only verse in this set to apply the term "brahman" to a non-returner.

10. On the fact that even devas and brahmās cannot know the course of the arahant, see MN 49, SN 23:2, AN 11:10, and Dhp 92–93.

11. The forms of mastery listed in this verse correspond to the three knowledges that comprised the Buddha's Awakening: knowledge of previous lives, knowledge of how beings pass away and are reborn in the various levels of being, and knowledge of the ending of the effluents that maintain the process of birth (see MN 4). It's in this verse that the Buddha redefines the three knowledges claimed by Vāseṭṭha and Bhāradvāja, showing that they don't qualify as masters of the three knowledges that constitute the knowledge of a genuine brahman in his eyes.

12. Here, of course, the Buddha is referring to the three knowledges as defined by him, not as earlier defined by Vāseṭṭha.

13. Sakka is the chief of the devas of the heaven of the Thirty-three.

3:10 Kokālika

SN 6:10 contains a shorter, less graphic version of this sutta.

I have heard that on one occasion the Blessed One was staying near Sāvatthī in Jeta's Grove, Anāthapiṇḍika's monastery. Then the monk Kokālika[1] went to the Blessed One and, on arrival, bowed down to him and sat to one side. As he was sitting there, he said to the Blessed One, "Lord, Sāriputta & Moggallāna have evil desires. They have fallen under the sway of evil desires."

When this was said, the Blessed One said to him, "Don't say that, Kokālika. Don't say that, Kolālika. Make your mind confident in Sāriputta & Moggallāna. They are admirable people."

A second time… A third time, the monk Kokālika said to the Blessed One, "Even though the lord Blessed One[2] inspires conviction and faith in me, Sāriputta & Moggallāna have evil desires. They have fallen under the sway of evil desires."

A third time, the Blessed One said to him, "Don't say that, Kokālika. Don't say that, Kolālika. Make your mind confident in Sāriputta & Moggallāna. They are admirable people."

Then the monk Kokālika, getting up from his seat, bowed down to the Blessed One, circumambulated him, keeping him to his right, and departed.

Then not long after he had departed, Kokālika's whole body became covered with boils the size of mustard seeds. From the size of mustard seeds, they became the size of green gram. From the size of green gram, they became the size of black beans. From the size of black beans, they became the size of jujube pits. From the size of jujube pits, they became the size of jujube fruits. From the size of jujube fruits, they became the size of myrobalans. From the size of myrobalans, they became the size of unripe vilva fruits. From the size of unripe vilva fruits, they became the size of small jackfruits. When they were the size of small jackfruits, they burst. Blood and pus flowed out. Then the monk Kokālika died of that disease and, having died, he reappeared in the Paduma hell for engendering hatred in his heart against Sāriputta & Moggallāna.

Then Brahmā Sahampati,[3] in the far extreme of the night, his extreme radiance lighting up the entirety of Jeta's Grove, went to the Blessed One. On arrival, having bowed down to him, he stood to one side. As he was standing there, he said to the Blessed One, "Lord, the monk Kokālika has died and, having died, has reappeared in the Paduma hell for engendering hatred in his heart against Sāriputta & Moggallāna." That is what Brahmā Sahampati said. Having said that, having bowed down, he circumambulated the Blessed One, keeping him to his right, and disappeared right there.

Then when the night had passed, the Blessed One addressed the monks, "Monks, last night Brahmā Sahampati, in the far extreme of the night, his extreme radiance lighting up the entirety of Jeta's Grove, came to me. On arrival, having bowed down to me, he stood to one side. As he was standing there, he said to me, 'Lord, the monk Kokālika has died and, having died, has reappeared in the Paduma hell for engendering hatred in his heart against Sāriputta & Moggallāna.' That is what Brahmā Sahampati said. Having said that, having bowed down, he circumambulated me, keeping me to his right, and disappeared right there."

When this was said, a certain monk said to the Blessed One, "Lord, how long is the measure of the lifespan in the Paduma hell?"

"Long, monk, is the measure of the lifespan in the Paduma hell. It's not easy to calculate 'this many years' or 'this many hundreds of years' or 'this many thousands of years' or 'this many hundreds of thousands of years.'"

"But, lord, can a simile be made?"

"It can, monk," said the Blessed One. "Suppose that there were a twenty-measure Kosalan cartload of sesame seeds. From that, a man would remove a sesame seed every hundred years.[4] That twenty-measure Kosalan cartload of sesame seeds would come to an end in this manner more quickly than a single Abbuda [Swelling] hell. Like twenty Abbuda hells is one Nirabbuda [Free from Swelling] hell. Like twenty Nirabbuda hells is one Ababa [Alas!] hell. Like twenty Ababa hells is one Ahaha hell. Like twenty Ahaha hells is one Aṭaṭa hell. Like twenty Aṭaṭa hells is one Kumuda [White Water Lily] hell. Like twenty Kumuda hells is one Sogandhika [Fragrant White Water Lily] hell. Like twenty Sogandhika hells is one Uppalaka [Blue Lotus] hell. Like twenty Uppalaka hells is one Puṇḍarīka [White Lotus] hell. Like twenty Puṇḍarīka hells is one Paduma [Red Lotus] hell.[5]

"The monk Kokālika has reappeared in the Paduma hell, for engendering hatred in his heart against Sāriputta & Moggallāna."

That is what the Blessed One said. Having said that, the One Well-Gone, the Teacher, said further:

"Surely, when a person is born,
an axe is born in his mouth, with which he cuts himself—
    the fool saying a bad statement.
Whoever praises one deserving censure or censures one deserving praise, accumulates wickedness[6] with his mouth, and in that wickedness finds no ease.
Next to nothing is the bad throw when one loses money at dice.
But great is the bad throw when one gets angered
at those well-gone.
For one hundred thousand Nirabbudas and thirty-six and five Abbudas, one who maligns noble ones, directing his words & heart toward evil, goes to hell.[7]

He goes to hell,
the one who asserts
what didn't take place,
as does the one
who, having done,
says, 'I didn't.'

Both—low-acting people—
there become equal:
after death, in the place beyond.[8]

Whoever harasses
an innocent man,
    a man pure, without blemish:
The evil comes right back to the fool
like fine dust
    thrown against the wind.[9]

One devoted to the strings of greed slanders others with his words:
faithless, stingy, miserly, mean, devoted to divisive tales.

You with your hard road of a mouth, untrue, ignoble,
destroyer of progress,
evil, doer of wrong,
lowest of men, wicked, degenerate:
    Don't speak a lot here.
You are headed to hell.
You scatter dust
to your harm.
You, an offender,
malign the good,
and, having engaged in many sorts of bad conduct are going for a long time to the pit.
For no one's action is annihilated.
Surely its owner gets it back.
An offender, the fool, sees suffering for himself in the next world.

He goes to the place set with iron spikes,
the sharp-bladed iron stake,

where the food, as is fitting, resembles a ball of heated iron.
When they [the hell-wardens] speak, they don't speak lovingly.
    They [the hell beings] can't run away.
    They're not going to shelter.
    They lie on ashes strewn about.
    They enter a blazing mass of fire.
Tying them up with nets,
they [the hell-wardens] strike them
with hammers made of iron.
Truly, they go to a blind darkness that spreads out like a fog.
Then they enter a copper pot,
a blazing mass of fire,
in which they cook for a long, long time, bobbing up & down in a mass of fire.
There the offender then cooks
in a mixture of blood & pus.
In whatever direction he leans to rest he festers at the touch.
There the offender then cooks
in an ooze where worms live, and there is no shore to which he can go, for the cooking pots all around are all the same.
Then they enter
the sharp sword-leaf forest where their limbs are cut off.
Seizing them by the tongue with a hook,
they [the hell-wardens] strike them,
dragging them back & forth.
Then they come to the Vettaraṇin,[10]
    hard to cross,
with sharp blades, razor blades,
and there they fall in,
    the fools,

evil-doers having done
evil deeds.
There, while they wail, voracious black & spotted dogs, jackals, & flocks of ravens chew on them.
Vultures & crows pick at them.

How hard, indeed, is this way of life there that offending people come to see.[11]
So, for the remainder of life here, a person, heedful, should do his duty.

Those loads of sesame seeds compared to the Paduma hell have been calculated by those who know as five times ten thousand crores,[12] plus twelve times one hundred more.

The length of the hells of suffering described here is how long [the hell-beings] will have to dwell there.
So when in the company of those who are pure, admirable, excellent, one should constantly guard one's words & heart.

Notes

1. Kokālika is a bhikkhu, or Buddhist monk. Normally, the texts refer to Buddhist monks as Ven. So-and-so, but in this case, the following story will show why posterity did not accord this honor to Kokālika. According to SnA, this Kokālika was not the same Kokālika who was one of Devadatta's followers. If that is so, it's remarkable that both Kokālikas expressed mistrust of Ven. Sāriputta and Moggallāna in exactly the same words (see Cv VII.4.2). An alternative possibility is that the two Kokālikas were actually the same person, and that he participated in Devadatta's schism during the "not long" period mentioned in this sutta separating his denunciation of Sāriputta and Moggallāna from the onset of his resulting disease.

2. This is an exaggerated form of address. See Ud 8:7, note 1.

3. See SN 6:1.

4. Reading vassa-satassa vassa-satassa with the Burmese edition. The Sri Lankan version reads, "every hundred years, every thousand years." The Thai edition reads, "every hundred years, every thousand years, every hundred thousand years."

5. Perhaps it goes without saying that the names of some of worst hells are ironic. SnA asserts that these are not separate hells, but simply different periods of time in the single Avīci hell, but it gives no explanation or justification for its assertion.

6. The word for wickedness, kali, is the same as the word for a bad throw at dice, which becomes the image in the following verse.

7. The version of this sutta at SN 6:10 ends here.

8. This verse = Dhp 306 and is also found in Iti 48.

9. This verse = Dhp 125.

10. Vettaraṇin: Literally, "having a battle of twigs/canes." SnA identifies this as the river of lye-water mentioned in MN 130, which contains a similarly graphic description of hell.

11. Reading passati with the Thai and Sri Lankan editions. The Burmese edition has phusati, "touch."

12. A crore is a large number that SNA calculates as equal to ten million.

3:11 Nālaka

Asita the seer, in his mid-day meditation, saw the Group of Thirty—Sakka[1] the king, and devas dressed in pure white exultant, ecstatic—
holding up banners, cheering wildly, & on seeing the devas so joyful & happy, having paid his respects, he said:

"Why is the deva community so wildly elated?
Why are they holding up banners & waving them around?
Even after the war with the Asuras —when victory was the devas', the Asuras defeated—
even then there was nothing hair-raising like this.
Seeing what marvel
are the devas so joyful?
    They whistle,
    they sing,
    play music,
    clap their hands,
    dance.
So I ask you, who live on Mount Meru's summit.
Please dispel my doubt quickly, dear sirs."

"The Bodhisatta, the foremost jewel, unequaled,
has been born for welfare & happiness
    in the human world,
in a town in the Sakyan countryside, Lumbini.

That's why we're contented, so wildly elated.
He, the highest of all beings,
the ultimate person,
a bull among men, highest of all people, will set turning the Wheel [of Dhamma] in the forest named after the seers, like a strong, roaring lion, the conqueror of beasts."

Hearing these words,
Asita quickly descended [from heaven]
and went to Suddhodana's dwelling.
There, taking a seat, he said to the Sakyans:
"Where is the prince?
I, too, want to see him."
The Sakyans then showed to the seer named Asita their son, the prince,
like gold aglow,
burnished by a most skillful smith
in the mouth of the furnace, blazing with glory, flawless in color.
On seeing the prince blazing like flame, pure like the bull of the stars going across the sky
—the burning sun,
released from the clouds of autumn—
he was exultant, filled with abundant rapture.
The devas held in the sky a many-spoked sunshade of a thousand circles.
Gold-handled whisks
waved up & down,
but those holding the whisks & the sunshade couldn't be seen.

The coiled-haired seer
named Dark Splendor,

seeing the boy, like an ornament of gold on the red woolen blanket, a white sunshade held over his head, received him, joyful in mind & pleased.
And on receiving the bull of the Sakyans, longingly, the master of mantras & signs exclaimed with a confident mind:
"This one is unsurpassed, the highest of the biped race."

Then, foreseeing his own imminent departure, he, dejected, shed tears.
On seeing him weeping,
the Sakyans asked:
"But surely there will be no danger for the prince?"
On seeing the Sakyans' concern he replied, "I foresee for the prince no harm.
Nor will there be any danger for him.
This one's not insignificant: Be assured.
This prince will touch
the ultimate self-awakening.
He, seeing the utmost purity, will set rolling the Wheel of Dhamma through sympathy for the welfare of many.
His holy life will spread far & wide.

But as for me,
my life here has no long remainder.
My death will take place before then.
I won't get to hear
the Dhamma of this one with the peerless role.
That's why I'm stricken, afflicted, & pained."

He, having brought the Sakyans abundant rapture,
the follower of the holy life left the inner chamber and,

out of sympathy for his nephew, urged him on toward the Dhamma of the one with the peerless role:
"When you hear from another the word,
    'Awakened One,'
or 'Attaining self-awakening, he lays open the path of the Dhamma,' go there and, asking him yourself, follow the holy life under that Blessed One."

Instructed by the one whose mind was set on his benefit,
        Such,
seeing in the future the utmost purity, Nālaka, who had laid up a store of merit, awaited the Victor expectantly, guarding his senses.
On hearing word of the Victor's turning of the foremost wheel, he went, he saw the bull among seers. Confident, he asked the foremost sage about the utmost sagacity, now that Asita's forecast had come to pass.

Nālaka:

"Now that I know
Asita's words to be true,
I ask you, Gotama,
you who have gone
to the beyond of all dhammas.
I'm intent on the homeless life;
I long for the almsround.
Tell me sage, when asked,
the highest state of sagacity."

The Buddha:

"I'll teach you
a sagacity hard to do,
hard to master.
Come now, I'll tell you.
Be steadfast. Be firm.
Practice even-mindedness, for in a village
there's praise & abuse.
Ward off any flaw in the heart.
Go about calmed & not haughty.
High & low things will come up like fire-flames in a forest.
Women seduce a sage.
May they not seduce you.[2] Abstaining from sexual intercourse, abandoning various sensual pleasures, be unopposed, unattached, to beings moving & still.
'As I am, so are these.
As are these, so am I.'
Drawing the parallel to
yourself,
neither kill nor get others to kill.
Abandoning the wants & greed where people run-of-the-mill are stuck, practice with vision,
cross over this hell.

Stomach not full,
moderate in food,
modest,
not being greedy,
always not hungering for wants:
One without hunger
is one who's unbound.

Having gone on his almsround, the sage should then go to the forest, approaching the root of a tree, taking a seat.

The enlightened one, intent on jhāna, should find delight in the forest, should practice jhāna at the foot of a tree, attaining his own satisfaction.
Then, at the end of the night,
he should go to the village, not delighting in an invitation or gift from the village.
Having gone to the village, the sage should not go forcing his way among families.
Cutting off chatter,
he shouldn't utter a scheming word.
    'I got something.
    That's fine.
    I got nothing.
    That, too, is good.'
Being such with regard to both,
he returns to the very same tree.
Wandering with his bowl in hand
    —not dumb,
    but seemingly dumb—
he shouldn't despise a piddling gift nor disparage the giver.
High & low are the practices proclaimed by the contemplative.
They don't go twice to the further shore.
This [unbinding] isn't sensed only once.[3]
In one who has no attachment—the monk who has cut the stream,[4] abandoning what is & isn't a duty—
    no fever is found.

I'll teach you
sagacity:Be like a razor's edge.
Pressing tongue against palate, restrain your stomach.
Neither be lazy in mind,
nor have many thoughts.
Be free of raw stench,[5]
    independent,
having the holy life as your aim.
Train in   solitude
            & the contemplative's task, Solitude
    is called sagacity.
Alone, you truly delight & shine in the ten directions.

On hearing the fame of the enlightened
    —those who practice jhāna, relinquishing sensuality—my disciple should foster all the more shame & conviction.

Know from the rivers
in clefts & in crevices:
Those in small channels flow noisily,
    the great
    flow silent.

Whatever's deficient
    makes noise.
Whatever is full
    is quiet.
The fool is like a half-empty pot;
one who is wise, a full lake.[6]

A contemplative who speaks a great deal endowed with meaning:

Knowing, he teaches the Dhamma;
knowing, he speaks a great deal.
But he who,
knowing, is restrained,
knowing, doesn't speak a great deal:
He is a sage
worthy of sagehood.
He is a sage,
his sagehood attained."

Notes

1. Reading Sakkañca with the Thai edition.

2. For an instance of a woman who tried to seduce a monk, see the origin story to Pācittiya 5 in The Buddhist Monastic Code, volume 1. For an instance of a man who tried to seduce a nun, see Thig 14.

3. According to SnA, the high and low practices taught by the Buddha are, respectively, the practice-mode of pleasant practice and quick intuition, and the practice-mode of painful practice and slow intuition (see AN 4:162). These modes of practice don't go twice to the further shore in the sense that each of the four paths—to stream-entry, once-returning, non-returning, and arahantship—abandons whatever defilements it is capable of abandoning once and for all. There is no need to repeat that particular path. Unbinding is not attained only once in the sense that it is touched as the result of each of the four paths.

4. SnA: the stream of defilements. However, the stream here could also be the stream of becoming mentioned in Sn 3:12.

5. See Sn 2:2.

6. This verse is quoted in the Milinda Pañhā.

3:12 The Contemplation of Dualities

I have heard that on one occasion the Blessed One was staying near Sāvatthī in the Eastern Monastery, the palace of Migāra's mother. Now on that occasion—the uposatha day of the fifteenth, a perfect full-moon night—the Blessed One was sitting in the open air surrounded by the Saṅgha of monks. Surveying the silent Saṅgha of monks, he addressed them: "Monks, if there are any who ask, 'Your listening to teachings that are skillful, noble, leading onward, going to self-awakening is a prerequisite for what?' they should be told, 'For the sake of knowing qualities of dualities as they actually are.' Which duality are you speaking about? 'This is stress. This is the origination of stress': This is one contemplation. 'This is the cessation of stress. This is the path of practice leading to the cessation of stress': This is a second contemplation. For a monk rightly contemplating this duality in this way—heedful, ardent, & resolute—one of two fruits can be expected: either gnosis right here-&-now, or—if there be any remnant of clinging-sustenance—non-return."

That is what the Blessed One said. Having said that, the One Well-Gone, the Teacher, said further:

> "Those who don't discern stress,
> what brings stress into play,
> & where it totally stops,
> without trace;
> who don't know the path,
> the way to the stilling of stress:
> lowly
> in their awareness-release > & discernment-release,
> incapable
> of making an end,
> they're headed
> to birth & aging.

But those who discern stress,
what brings stress into play,
& where it totally stops,
    without trace;
who discern the path,
the way to the stilling of stress:
    consummate
in their awareness-release & discernment-release,
    capable
of making an end,
    they aren't headed
    to birth & aging.[1]

"Now, if there are any who ask, 'Would there be the right contemplation of dualities in yet another way?' they should be told, 'There would.' How would that be? 'Whatever stress comes into play is all from acquisition[2] as a requisite condition': This is one contemplation. 'From the remainderless fading & cessation of that very acquisition, there is no coming into play of stress': This is a second contemplation. For a monk rightly contemplating this duality in this way—heedful, ardent, & resolute—one of two fruits can be expected: either gnosis right here-&-now, or—if there be any remnant of clinging-sustenance—non-return."

That is what the Blessed One said. Having said that, the One Well-Gone, the Teacher, said further:

"From acquisition as cause
the many forms of stress
come into being in the world.
Whoever, unknowing,
makes acquisitions
    —the dullard—
comes to stress
    again & again.

Therefore, discerning,
you shouldn't create acquisitions
as you stay focused on

the birth & origin of stress."

"Now, if there are any who ask, 'Would there be the right contemplation of dualities in yet another way?' they should be told, 'There would.' How would that be? 'Whatever stress comes into play is all from ignorance as a requisite condition': This is one contemplation. 'From the remainderless fading & cessation of that very ignorance, there is no coming into play of stress': This is a second contemplation. For a monk rightly contemplating this duality in this way—heedful, ardent, & resolute—one of two fruits can be expected: either gnosis right here-&-now, or—if there be any remnant of clinging-sustenance—non-return."

That is what the Blessed One said. Having said that, the One Well-Gone, the Teacher, said further:

"Those who journey the wandering-on through birth & death, again & again,
    in this state here
    or anywhere else,
that destination is simply through ignorance.
This ignorance is a great delusion whereby they have wandered-on a long, long time.
While beings immersed in clear knowing don't go to further becoming.

"Now, if there are any who ask, 'Would there be the right contemplation of dualities in yet another way?' they should be told, 'There would.' How would that be? 'Whatever stress comes into play is all from fabrication as a requisite condition': This is one contemplation. 'From the remainderless fading & cessation of that very fabrication, there is no coming into play of stress': This is a second contemplation. For a monk rightly contemplating this duality in this way—heedful, ardent, & resolute—one of two fruits can be expected: either gnosis right here-&-now, or—if there be any remnant of clinging-sustenance—non-return."

That is what the Blessed One said. Having said that, the One Well-Gone, the Teacher, said further:

"Any stress that comes into play is all from fabrication
    as a requisite
    condition.
With the cessation of fabrication,
    there is no stress
    coming into play.
Knowing this drawback—
that stress comes from fabrication
    as a requisite
    condition—
with the tranquilizing of all fabrication, with the stopping of perception:
    That's how there is
    the ending of stress.
Knowing this as it actually is,
an attainer-of-knowledge
    sees rightly.
    Seeing rightly,
    the wise—
conquering the fetter of Māra—go to no further becoming.

That is what the Blessed One said. Having said that, the One Well-Gone, the Teacher, said further:

"Any stress that comes into play is all from consciousness

as a requisite
condition.
With the cessation of consciousness,
there is no stress
coming into play.
Knowing this drawback—
that stress comes from consciousness
as a requisite
condition—
with the stilling of consciousness, the monk
free from hunger
is totally unbound.

"Now, if there are any who ask, 'Would there be the right contemplation of dualities in yet another way?' they should be told, 'There would.' How would that be? 'Whatever stress comes into play is all from contact as a requisite condition': This is one contemplation. 'From the remainderless fading & cessation of that very contact, there is no coming into play of stress': This is a second contemplation. For a monk rightly contemplating this duality in this way—heedful, ardent, & resolute—one of two fruits can be expected: either gnosis right here-&-now, or—if there be any remnant of clinging-sustenance—non-return."

That is what the Blessed One said. Having said that, the One Well-Gone, the Teacher, said further:

"For those overcome by contact, flowing along in the stream of becoming,
following a miserable path,
the ending of fetters
is far away.
While those who comprehend contact, delighting in stilling through discernment, they, by breaking through contact,
free from hunger,
are totally unbound.

"Now, if there are any who ask, 'Would there be the right contemplation of dualities in yet another way?' they should be told, 'There would.' How would that be? 'Whatever stress comes into play is all from feeling as a requisite condition': This is one contemplation. 'From the remainderless fading & cessation of that very feeling, there is no coming into play of stress': This is a second contemplation. For a monk rightly contemplating this duality in this way—heedful, ardent, & resolute—one of two fruits can be expected: either gnosis right here-&-now, or—if there be any remnant of clinging-sustenance—non-return."

That is what the Blessed One said. Having said that, the One Well-Gone, the Teacher, said further:

"Knowing that whatever is felt—
pleasure, pain,
neither pleasure nor pain, within or without—
is stressful;
seeing
its deceptive nature,
its dissolving,
its passing away
at each contact,
each contact,
he knows it right there:
With just the ending of feeling,
there is no stress
coming into play.

"Now, if there are any who ask, 'Would there be the right contemplation of dualities in yet another way?' they should be told, 'There would.' How would that be? 'Whatever stress comes into play is all from craving as a requisite condition': This is one contemplation. 'From the remainderless fading & cessation of that very craving, there is no coming into play of stress': This is a second contemplation. For a monk rightly contemplating this duality in this way—heedful, ardent, & resolute—one of two fruits can be expected: either gnosis right here-&-now, or—if there be any remnant of clinging-sustenance—non-return."

That is what the Blessed One said. Having said that, the One Well-Gone, the Teacher, said further:

"With craving his companion, a man
wanders on a long, long time.
Neither in this state here
nor anywhere else
does he go beyond
    the wandering-   on.
Knowing this drawback—
that craving brings stress into play—
free   from craving,
devoid   of clinging,
mindful,   the monk
    lives the mendicant life."[3]

"Now, if there are any who ask, 'Would there be the right contemplation of dualities in yet another way?' they should be told, 'There would.' How would that be? 'Whatever stress comes into play is all from clinging as a requisite condition': This is one contemplation. 'From the remainderless fading & cessation of that very clinging, there is no coming into play of stress': This is a second contemplation. For a monk rightly contemplating this duality in this way—heedful, ardent, & resolute—one of two fruits can be expected: either gnosis right here-&-now, or—if there be any remnant of clinging-sustenance—non-return."

That is what the Blessed One said. Having said that, the One Well-Gone, the Teacher, said further:

"From clinging as a requisite condition comes becoming.
One who has come into being goes
    to stress.
    There is death
for one who is born.

This is the coming into play
    of stress.
Thus, with the ending of clinging, the wise
    seeing rightly,
    directly knowing
    the ending of birth,
go to no further becoming.

That is what the Blessed One said. Having said that, the One Well-Gone, the Teacher, said further:

"Any stress that comes into play is all from arousal
    as a requisite
    condition.
With the cessation of arousal,
    there is no stress
    coming into play.
Knowing this drawback—
that stress comes from arousal
    as a requisite
    condition—
with the relinquishing
of all arousal,
a monk released in non-arousal, his craving for becoming crushed,
his mind at peace,
his wandering-on in birth totally ended:

He has no further becoming.

That is what the Blessed One said. Having said that, the One Well-Gone, the Teacher, said further:

"Any stress that comes into play is all from nutriment
    as a requisite
    condition.
With the cessation of nutriment,
    there is no stress
    coming into play.
Knowing this drawback—
that stress comes from nutriment
    as a requisite
    condition—
comprehending all nutriment, independent of all nutriment,[6] rightly seeing freedom from disease
through the total ending of effluents,
    judiciously associating,
    a judge,
he, an attainer-of-knowledge,
goes beyond judgment,
    beyond classification.[7]

"Now, if there are any who ask, 'Would there be the right contemplation of dualities in yet another way?' they should be told, 'There would.' How would that be? 'Whatever stress comes into play is all from what is perturbed as a requisite condition': This is one contemplation. 'From the remainderless fading & cessation of what is perturbed, there is no coming into play of stress': This is a second contemplation. For a monk rightly contemplating this duality in this way—heedful, ardent, & resolute—one of two fruits can be expected: either gnosis right here-&-now, or—if there be any remnant of clinging-sustenance—non-return."

That is what the Blessed One said. Having said that, the One Well-Gone, the Teacher, said further:

"Any stress that comes into play is all from what is perturbed
    as a requisite
    condition.
With the cessation of what is perturbed,
    there is no stress
    coming into play.
Knowing this drawback—
that stress comes from what is perturbed
    as a requisite
    condition—
the monk thus renouncing perturbance, putting a stop to fabrications, free from perturbance, free from clinging, mindful he lives
the mendicant life.

"Now, if there are any who ask, 'Would there be the right contemplation of dualities in yet another way?' they should be told, 'There would.' How would that be? 'For one who is dependent, there is wavering': This is one contemplation. 'One who is independent doesn't waver': This is a second contemplation. For a monk rightly contemplating this duality in this way—heedful, ardent, & resolute—one of two fruits can be expected: either gnosis right here-&-now, or—if there be any remnant of clinging-sustenance—non-return."

That is what the Blessed One said. Having said that, the One Well-Gone, the Teacher, said further:

"One independent doesn't waver.
One dependent,
clinging
    to this state here
    or anywhere else,
doesn't go beyond
the wandering-on.
Knowing this drawback—
    the great danger in dependencies—
independent,
free from clinging,
mindful the monk
lives the mendicant life.[8]

"Now, if there are any who ask, 'Would there be the right contemplation of dualities in yet another way?' they should be told, 'There would.' How would that be? 'Formless phenomena are more peaceful than forms': This is one contemplation. 'Cessation is more peaceful than formless phenomena': This is a second contemplation. For a monk rightly contemplating this duality in this way—heedful, ardent, & resolute—one of two fruits can be expected: either gnosis right here-&-now, or—if there be any remnant of clinging-sustenance—non-return."

That is what the Blessed One said. Having said that, the One Well-Gone, the Teacher, said further:

Those beings headed to forms,
and those standing in the formless,
with no knowledge of cessation,

return to further becoming.

But, comprehending form,
not taking a stance in formless things,
those released in cessation
are people who've left death behind.[9]

"Now, if there are any who ask, 'Would there be the right contemplation of dualities in yet another way?' they should be told, 'There would.' How would that be? 'Whatever is considered as "This is true" by the world with its devas, Māras, & Brahmās, by this generation with its contemplatives & brahmans, its royalty & commonfolk, is rightly seen as it has come to be with right discernment by the noble ones as "This is false"': This is one contemplation. 'Whatever is considered as "This is false" by the world with its devas, Māras, & Brahmās, by this generation with its contemplatives & brahmans, its royalty & commonfolk, is rightly seen as it has come to be with right discernment by the noble ones as "This is true"': This is a second contemplation. For a monk rightly contemplating this duality in this way—heedful, ardent, & resolute—one of two fruits can be expected: either gnosis right here-&-now, or—if there be any remnant of clinging-sustenance—non-return."

That is what the Blessed One said. Having said that, the One Well-Gone, the Teacher, said further:

"See the world, together with its devas, supposing not-self to be self.
Entrenched in name-&-form, they suppose that 'This is true.'
In whatever terms they suppose it it turns into something other than that,[10] and that's what's false about it: Changing,
it's deceptive by nature.
Undeceptive by nature is unbinding[11]:
That the noble ones know
    as true.

They, through breaking through to the truth,
hunger-free,
are totally unbound.

"Now, if there are any who ask, 'Would there be the right contemplation of dualities in yet another way?' they should be told, 'There would.' How would that be? 'Whatever is considered as "This is bliss" by the world with its devas, Māras, & Brahmās, by this generation with its contemplatives & brahmans, its royalty & commonfolk, is rightly seen as it has come to be with right discernment by the noble ones as "This is stressful"': This is one contemplation. 'Whatever is considered as "This is stressful" by the world with its devas, Māras, & Brahmās, by this generation with its contemplatives & brahmans, its royalty & commonfolk, is rightly seen as it has come to be with right discernment by the noble ones as "This is bliss"': This is a second contemplation. For a monk rightly contemplating this duality in this way—heedful, ardent, & resolute—one of two fruits can be expected: either gnosis right here-&-now, or—if there be any remnant of clinging-sustenance—non-return."

That is what the Blessed One said. Having said that, the One Well-Gone, the Teacher, said further:

"All sights, sounds, smells, tastes, tactile sensations, & ideas that are   welcome,
    appealing,
agreeable—
as long as they're said to exist,
are supposed by the world together with its devas to be bliss.
But when they cease,
that's supposed by them to be stress.
The stopping of self-identity is viewed by the noble ones

as bliss.
This, when seen,
runs counter
to the whole world.

What others say is blissful,
the noble ones say is stress.
What others say is stressful,
the noble know as bliss.
See the Dhamma, hard to understand!
Here those who don't know are confused.
For those who are veiled,
it's darkness,
blindness
for those who don't see.
But for the good it is blatant, like light for those who see.

Though in its very presence, they don't understand it—dumb animals, unadept in the Dhamma.
It's not easy
for those overcome
by passion for becoming,
flowing along
in the stream of becoming, falling under Māra's sway,[12] to wake up to this Dhamma.

Who, apart from the noble, is worthy to wake up to this state?—
the state that,
through rightly knowing it,
they totally unbind,
effluent-free."

That is what the Blessed One said. Gratified, the monks delighted in the Blessed One's words. And while this explanation was being given, the minds of 60 monks, through lack of clinging, were released from effluents.

1. See SN 56:22.

2. The term 'acquisition' (upadhi), in its everyday sense, denotes the possessions, baggage, and other paraphernalia that a nomadic family might carry around with it in its wanderings. On the psychological level, it denotes anything for which one might have a sense of 'I' or 'mine' and which, consequently, one would carry around as a kind of mental baggage. The verse following this prose passage is identical with the Buddha's first answer to Mettagū in Sn 5:4.

IV : The Octet Chapter (Aṭṭhaka Vagga)

Introduction

The Aṭṭhaka Vagga[1] is a set of sixteen poems on the theme of non-clinging. The poems cover all four types of clinging—clinging to sensuality, to views, to habits and practices, and to doctrines of the self (MN 44)—with a special emphasis on the first three. They touch the issues of what constitutes the nature of the clinging in each particular case, the drawbacks of the clinging, the advantages of abandoning clinging, ways to abandon clinging, and the subtle paradoxes of what it means not to cling.

This last point is discussed in many suttas in the Pali Canon, as the Buddha's teachings on non-clinging all contain a central paradox: Some of the objects of clinging that must ultimately be abandoned nevertheless form part of the path to their abandoning. A certain amount of sensual pleasure in terms of adequate food and shelter is needed to follow the path to go beyond sensuality; right view is needed to overcome attachment to views; a regimen of precepts and practices is needed to overcome attachment to habits and practices; a strong sense of self-responsibility is needed to overcome attachment to doctrines of the self.[2]

Other passages in the Pali Canon offer clear analogies to explain these paradoxes, often in terms of movement toward a goal—taking a raft across a river, walking to a park, taking a series of relay coaches from one city to another[3]—in which the motive and means of transport are abandoned on reaching the goal. AN 4:194 states explicitly that release occurs only when, after having endowed oneself with right virtue, right concentration, and right discernment, one makes the mind dispassionate toward phenomena that are conducive to passion, and liberates the mind from phenomena that are conducive to liberation.

The Canon also contains passages that state in fairly specific language how the views and habits of the path are right not only because they are true, but also—and especially—because they allow for their own transcendence. AN 10:93 is particularly enlightening on this point. In it, Anāthapiṇḍika visits a group of sectarians who ask him what views the Buddha has. Anāthapiṇḍika—who was a stream-enterer at the time—states that he doesn't know the full extent of the Buddha's views. This reflects the fact that the Buddha's awakening was not defined by his views, so that even a stream-enterer, who is consummate in view (diṭṭhi-sampanna) needed for the path, would still not know the full extent of what views a fully awakened person might have.

At Anāthapiṇḍika's request, the sectarians tell him their views, after which he criticizes them for clinging to views that are "brought into being, fabricated, willed, dependently co-arisen," and therefore inconstant and stressful. In clinging to those views, he says, they are thus clinging to stress.

The sectarians then ask Anāthapiṇḍika his view, and he states it in these terms: "Whatever has been brought into being, is fabricated, willed, dependently co-arisen: That is inconstant. Whatever is inconstant is stress. Whatever is stress is not me, is not what I am, is not my self. This is the sort of view I have." The sectarians then accuse Anāthapiṇḍika of clinging to this view, and thus clinging to stress, but he responds that in seeing this view well with right discernment he also discerns the escape from it. In other words, right view teaches him not only the way things are, but also encourages him to develop dispassion to all things fabricated, including right view itself. This answer leaves the sectarians speechless. Anāthapiṇḍika then goes to report this conversation to the Buddha, who approves of what he said.

In simple terms, the message of Anāthapiṇḍika's statement is that right view includes a correct understanding of what to do with right view. This point is conveyed by the simile of the water-snake in MN 22: There are right and wrong ways of grasping the Dhamma, but before letting it go, one must grasp it correctly in order to get the best use out of it. One of the wrong ways of grasping right view is to engage in formal debates with those who want to argue in defense of wrong view. MN 60 and AN 4:24 show why these kinds of debates are best avoided both by people on the path to awakening and by those who are fully awakened. MN 60 points out that one of the implications of the four noble truths is that there exists cessation of becoming. This is in direct opposition to the wrong view that there is no cessation of becoming. But as long as one has not seen and known for oneself that there is cessation of becoming, it would not be fitting to argue that there is cessation of becoming, saying, "Only this is true, anything otherwise is worthless." One is not yet fully qualified to make that statement. But even when one has verified the truth that there is cessation of becoming, AN 4:24 points out one would no longer be defined by or "fastened to" a view about that fact, in which case one feel no personal need to enter into debate on the topic.

The Aṭṭhaka contains many passages that agree with MN 60 and AN 2:24 on these points. However, its primary argument for avoiding debates is that they give rise to conceit, and that conceit in turn leads to becoming and non-becoming. In fact, this is the Aṭṭhaka's main strategy for avoiding clinging to all aspects of the path: Follow the path, it says in essence, but don't develop conceit around it. Renounce sexual intercourse, but don't suppose yourself to be better than others because you do (4:7). Don't boast of your habits and practices (4:3), and don't despise others for theirs (4:14). These points are in line with the passage in MN 78 that defines the "cessation of skillful habits" as the case where one is virtuous but not fashioned of virtue—i.e., one does not define oneself in terms of one's virtue.

Similarly with views: 4:9 states that an attainer-of-knowledge isn't fashioned of views, and so isn't measured or made proud by them. For a person still on the path, it's easy to get entrenched in one's views (4:3), so it's best not to get involved in debates. Even winning a debate doesn't establish the truth, and one risks falling into the trap of regarding oneself as inferior, equal, or superior on the basis of view (4:8).

These teachings on the first three forms of clinging are summed up in the Aṭṭhaka's simple statements about avoiding the fourth form of clinging, to doctrines of the self: Don't theorize about self (4:14), don't display "self" in any realm (4:6), and remove all sense of "mine-ness" or "mine" (4:2, 4:6, 4:11, 4:14–15).

So the Aṭṭhaka's teachings on these points fall in line with those in the rest of the Canon in resolving the paradox around the topic of clinging. Nevertheless, the poems in the Aṭṭhaka also contains a handful of passages that present these paradoxes in a mystifying way. In fact, some of the paradoxes—particularly in the discussions of abandoning clinging to views and habits and practices—are stated in terms so stark that, on the surface, they are hard to reconcile with teachings in other Pali suttas or with other passages in the Aṭṭhaka itself. Taken out of context, they seem to say that the path consists of no views, that it is a practice of no fixed practices and no goals, and that it is not even aimed at knowledge.

The question is thus whether these paradoxes should be taken at face value or further interpreted. Or, to put the question in terms used by the Buddha himself (AN 2:25): Is their meaning, as stated, already fully drawn out or does it have to be inferred? Readers of the poems have offered arguments for both sides.

The argument for taking the paradoxes at face value is based on two major assumptions: that the Aṭṭhaka is historically prior to the rest of the Pali Canon and that it contains a complete statement of the Buddha's early teachings. From these assumptions, the argument goes on to conclude that if these poems conflict with other passages in the Canon, that is simply because those other passages are less true to the Buddha's original message.

Both of the assumptions on which this argument is based, however, contain several weaknesses.

• To begin with the assumption about the age of the poems: Five pieces of evidence are offered as proof that they predate the rest of the Canon—

1) The Aṭṭhaka Vagga, as a set, is mentioned at three other points in the Canon, at Ud 5:6, Mv V, and SN 22:3.[4]

2) Another book in the Canon, the Mahāniddesa (Nd I), is devoted to offering detailed commentaries on each of the poems, an honor that is extended to only two other sections in the Canon: the Pārāyana Vagga (Sn 5) and the Rhinoceros Sutta (Sn 1:3).

3) Although poems in different parts of the Canon borrow passages from one another without mentioning the fact, no other passage in the Canon borrows any of the verses in the Aṭṭhaka without mentioning their source.

4) The language of the poems is more archaic than that used in other suttas.

5) A complete version of the Aṭṭhaka, along with several additions, is found in the Chinese Canon. No other book of the Pali Canon has such a direct correspondence in the Chinese Canon.

However, none of these pieces of evidence can carry the weight of what they are supposed to prove.

1) The first piece shows simply that an Aṭṭhaka Vagga predates the three passages in question, not necessarily that the Aṭṭhaka Vagga as we have it is identical to the one they mention or that it predates the entire remainder of the Canon. In the three passages in question, only one verse from the Aṭṭhaka Vagga is actually quoted, which is not enough to establish the identity of the Aṭṭhaka Vagga as a whole.

It's not even possible to determine with any certainty which poems in the vagga (chapter) were composed before the others. Because four of the poems in the vagga—4:2–5—have "Aṭṭhaka" in their Pali names, it has been argued that they may have formed the original core of the vagga. But a common feature of the Pali Canon is that a vagga will often be named after the most prominent suttas or rules in the vagga, but that these are not necessarily placed first in the vagga. Nor were they necessarily composed first. The poems in the first half of the Aṭṭhaka are arranged in order of increasing length, and the vagga may have taken its name from the simple fact that, given this arrangement, the "Octets" became prominent.

2) The existence of Nd I shows simply that the Aṭṭhaka Vagga, from early on, was regarded as a difficult text, one that required thorough explanation. It's no proof that the Aṭṭhaka predated everything else in the Canon. In fact, there's always the possibility that Nd I—and its partner, the Cullaniddesa (Nd II), the text explaining 1:1 and 5—were part of a planned effort to explain the entire Sutta Nipāta, an effort that, for one reason or another, was never completed.

3) The fact that none of the passages of the Aṭṭhaka Vagga were borrowed by other poems in the Canon without mentioning the source may simply be due to the fact that its most striking passages carried a meaning strongly shaped by context, and the Buddha or the compilers of the Canon realized that if they were taken out of context they could have been easily misunderstood.

4) The version of the Aṭṭhaka Vagga in the Chinese Canon was translated many centuries after the Buddha passed away. So its existence proves nothing about what may have predated the Pali Canon.

5) As for the archaic nature of the language, that is common to a great deal of the poetry throughout the Pali Canon. Just as Tennyson's poetry contains more archaisms than Dryden's prose, the fact that a Pali poem uses archaic language is no proof of its actual age. It's easy for a poet writing at a later age to affect the language and poetic styles of an earlier age to give an air of venerability to the message of a poem. And considering that the audience to whom these poems were addressed included brahmans, and—as we noted in the Introduction—brahmans may have preferred archaic modes of expression, there is good reason to believe that the Buddha may have deliberately adopted archaic forms in order to appeal to that segment of his audience.

• However, even if the Aṭṭhaka Vagga actually was composed early in the Buddha's teaching career, that does not mean that it contains a complete statement of his early teachings. In fact, internal evidence in the Aṭṭhaka strongly suggests otherwise.

To begin with, the discussions on clinging throughout the Aṭṭhaka state that clinging is caused by craving, and that it should be abandoned so as to avoid becoming and not-becoming. Anyone familiar with dependent co-arising will notice that these three factors, in this order, form a part of that larger teaching. However, nowhere in the Aṭṭhaka Vagga is there any explanation about what kind of becoming and non-becoming the Buddha is talking about, or what their drawbacks are. Only in suttas that provide the larger context of dependent co-arising—which shows how becoming leads to repeated birth, and so to suffering and stress; and how even the desire for non-becoming leads to becoming—are these points explained. (See, for instance, SN 12:2 and MN 49.) Anyone listening to the Aṭṭhaka without any knowledge of that larger context would naturally question why becoming and non-becoming should be avoided, and why clinging is thus inherently bad.

Similarly, the Aṭṭhaka states that inner peace cannot be found except through views, learning, and knowledge (4:9), and that one should train for the path of knowledge (4:11), but nowhere does it state clearly what kind of views, learning, and knowledge it's talking about. Again, anyone unaware of the Buddha's teachings elsewhere on these topics would surely ask for clarification on these points.

In addition, the Aṭṭhaka recommends avoiding objectification (4:11, 4:14), being mindful (4:1, 4:10, 4:14, 4:16), practicing jhāna (4:14, 4:16), and aiming for unbinding (4:7, 4:14–15), but never explains what these terms mean.

It's hard to believe that, in delivering the teachings in the Aṭṭhaka, the Buddha would not be asked these questions on these topics. And it's harder to believe that he would not answer them. Yet that's what we're asked to assume if we are to believe that the Aṭṭhaka was a complete statement of his early teachings.

In AN 2:46, the Buddha divides assemblies into two sorts: those trained in bombast, and those trained in cross-questioning. An assembly trained in bombast is eager to hear teachings that are elegant in their terms and expression, but they are not encouraged to ask the meaning of the terms or how the terms are to be applied in practice. An assembly trained in cross-questioning, however, is trained to ask these questions and to expect clear and practical answers. To believe that the Aṭṭhaka is a complete statement of the Buddha's early teachings is to assume that he was training his followers in bombast—an assumption that is hard to accept.

• Finally, there is the issue of consistency. As we have noted, the starker expressions of the paradoxes in the Aṭṭhaka have been interpreted to teach a view of no views, and a practice of no fixed practices and no goals, not even aimed at knowledge. Yet these interpretations are inconsistent with other passages in the Aṭṭhaka itself, such as the clear-cut view explaining the sources of conflict, presented in 4:11, the long descriptions of how a monk should and shouldn't practice (such as those in 4:14 and 4:16), the statement that one should train for the path of knowledge (4:11), and the frequent references to unbinding (nibbāna/nibbuti) as the goal of the practice. So even if the Aṭṭhaka is appreciably older than the other Pali suttas, we would have to assume gross inconsistencies in its message if we were to take its paradoxes at face value.

The argument that the meaning of the Aṭṭhaka's paradoxes must be inferred—that they were intentionally stated in obscure terms—is based on firmer ground. First is the simple fact that they make better sense, when taken as a whole, if the paradoxes are explored for meanings not obvious on the surface. A prime example is the passage toward the beginning of 4:9, in which the Buddha in one sentence seems to be saying that an awakened person would regard purity as not being found by means of views, habits and practices, etc., and then in the next sentence says that it is not found through lack of views, habits and practices, etc. Māgandiya, the Buddha's listener, responds understandably that such a teaching is confused.

Readers who have acquired a taste for Mahāyāna non-dualities, and who would take the Buddha's statement at face value, might scoff at Māgandiya's narrow-mindedness. But, if the words are taken at face value, Māgandiya would be right. The words on the surface are very unhelpful, for they give no idea of what one should do.

It turns out, however, that there is a grammatical pun at stake. The terms in the Buddha's initial statement are put in the instrumental case—which can be interpreted literally as "through" or "by means of," but idiomatically as "in terms of" or "in connection with." The second sentence puts the words for lack of view, etc., in the ablative case, which carries the meaning "because of" or "from." If we interpret the instrumental in the first sentence in its idiomatic sense, the two sentences make sense in and of themselves, and fit with the rest of the Aṭṭhaka—and the Canon as a whole: An awakened person would not define purity in terms of views, habits and practices, etc., but would also realize that purity cannot be attained through a lack of these things. This fits with the position taken throughout the suttas, that the goal is unfabricated, but the path to the goal must of necessity be fabricated. Therefore the path requires developing qualities that are not contained in the goal and that will have to be abandoned when the goal is reached (see, for example, MN 22, MN 24, and Iti 90).

This case shows that there is a lot to be gained by looking under the surface of paradoxes so that, unlike Māgandiya, we won't be confused by them.

A second reason for regarding the paradoxes as requiring interpretation is one that we have already noted in the Introduction. In their use of puns and grammatical wordplay, they follow an ancient Indian genre—the philosophical enigma—that by its very nature called for extensive interpretation. Evidence in the Ṛgveda shows that ancient Vedic ritual included contests in which elder brahmans used puns and other wordplay to express philosophical teachings as riddles that contestants were then challenged to solve.[5] The purpose of these contests was to teach the contestants to use their powers of ingenuity in thinking "outside the box," in the justified belief that the process of searching for inspiration and being illuminated by the answer would transform the mind in a much deeper way than would be achieved simply by absorbing information.[6]

Although the Aṭṭhaka poems advise against engaging in intellectual contests, they occasionally imitate the Vedic enigmas in the way they use language to challenge the reader. Individual words—sometimes whole lines and verses—in the poems can be interpreted in a variety of ways, and it's up to the reader to explore and consider all the various meanings to decide which are most helpful. Although our culture at present associates wordplay with jokes, the Aṭṭhaka stands at the head of a long line of Buddhist texts—both Theravādin and not—that use wordplay with a serious purpose: to teach the reader to think independently, to see through the uncertainties of language, and so to help loosen any clinging to the structures that language imposes on the mind.[7] This type of rhetoric also rewards anyone who takes the text seriously enough to re-read and re-think what it has to say.

These points suggest that the obscurity of some of the Aṭṭhaka's language can be regarded as a function, not of the poems' age, but of the genre to which they belong. The proper reading of a text like this requires that you question your assumptions about its message and clarify the intention behind your efforts at reaching an understanding. In this way, the act of reading is meant not only to inform but also to transform. The more you give to it, the more it opens up new possibilities in the mind.

Translating wordplay of this sort presents enormous challenges; even when those challenges are surmounted, the act of reading such word games in translation can never be quite the same as reading them in the original language and cultural setting. Fortunately, aside from the more controversial passages, much of the Aṭṭhaka is perfectly straightforward—although Ven. Mahā Kaccāna's commentary in SN 22:3 on one of the simpler verses in 4:9 should serve as warning that even the straightforward passages can contain hidden meanings. In passages where I have detected multiple meanings, I've included all the detected meanings in the translation—although I'm sure that there are instances of double meanings that I may have missed. Wherever the Pali seems ambiguous, I've tried to use English equivalents that convey the same ambiguity. Wherever this has proven beyond my abilities, I've resorted to explanatory notes. I have also used the notes to cite interpretations from Nd I and other passages from earlier parts of the Canon that help explain paradoxes, puns, and other obscure points—both as an aid to the serious reader and as a way of showing that the gulf assumed to separate the Aṭṭhaka from the rest of the sutta collection is more imagined than real.

Two final notes on reading the Aṭṭhaka:

• Although these poems were originally composed for an audience of wandering, homeless monks, they offer valuable lessons for lay people as well. Even the passages referring directly to the homeless life can be read as symbolic of a state of mind. Ven. Mahā Kaccāna's commentary, mentioned above, shows that this has been done ever since canonical times. Addressing a lay person, and commenting on a verse describing the behavior of a sage who has abandoned home and society, he interprets "home" as the aggregates, and "society" as sense impressions. Thus in his hands the verse develops an internal meaning that lay people can apply to their lives without necessarily leaving their external home and society. Other verses in the poems can be interpreted in similar ways.

• The poems center on descriptions of sages (muni) and enlightened people (dhīra), but these words don't have fixed meanings from verse to verse. In some contexts, they denote arahants; in others, nothing more than intelligent run-of-the-mill people. So be alert to context when reading descriptions about sages and enlightened people, to see whether they're describing people following the path or those who have already reached the goal.

Notes

1. The name of the Aṭṭhaka (Octets) appears to derive from the fact that four of its poems—4:2–5, all of which contain the word aṭṭhaka in their titles—are composed of eight verses.

2. On the skillful uses of "self," see AN 3:40 and AN 4:159. See also Selves & Not-self. For a discussion of the four types of clinging, see The Mind Like Fire Unbound, chapter 3, and The Paradox of Becoming, chapter 4.

3. See MN 22, SN 51:15, and MN 24.

4. Ven. Mahā Kaccāna—cited by the Buddha at AN 1:146 (1:197) as foremost among the monks in his ability to analyze in detail meaning of what was stated in brief—is mentioned in connection with the Aṭṭhaka in all three locations. As a well-educated brahman, he would have been trained in detecting and resolving philosophical enigmas. His personal reputation indicates that he enjoyed doing so.

5. On this point, see Willard Johnson's, Poetry and Speculation of the Rig Veda, Berkeley: University of California Press, 1980.

6. By the Buddha's time, these contests had left the ritual arena and had become public philosophical debates much closer to our current notion of a formal debate. However, they were driven by an assumption—derived from the belief in the spiritual transformation that accompanied the correct solution of the philosophical enigma—that holding a winning view was, in and of itself, the measure of a person's high spiritual attainment. The paradoxes in the Aṭṭhaka attack this assumption by, paradoxically, making use of the genre of philosophical enigma from which it originally derived.

7. Other examples of such wordplay in the Pali Canon include SN 1:1 and Dhp 97. For more modern examples of Buddhist texts using word play with a serious purpose, see A Heart Released and The Ballad of Liberation from the Khandhas, both by Phra Ajaan Mun Bhūridatto.

4:1 Sensual Pleasure

If one, longing for sensual pleasure, achieves it, yes,
he's enraptured at heart.
The mortal gets what he wants.
    But if for that person
    —longing, desiring—
the pleasures diminish, he's afflicted,
as if shot with an arrow.

Whoever avoids sensual desires
—as he would, with his foot, the head of a snake—
goes beyond, mindful,
this attachment in the world.

A man who is greedy
    for fields, land, gold, cattle, horses,
    servants, employees,
    women, relatives,
    many sensual pleasures, is overpowered with weakness and trampled by trouble, for pain invades him
as water, a cracked boat.[1]

So one, always mindful, should avoid sensual desires.
    Letting them go,
he'd cross over the flood like one who, having bailed out the boat, has reached the far shore.[2]

Notes

1. Asaṅga, in the Yogācārabhūmi, quotes a Sanskrit version of this poem whose verses correspond to the Pali up to this point, but then ends with another verse that has no direct Pali parallel.

2. The Chinese version of the Aṭṭhaka Vagga adds, at this point, the verses on grieving and separation found in AN 5:49.

4:2 The Cave Octet

Staying attached to the cave, covered heavily over,[1] a person sunk in confusion is far from seclusion—
for sensual pleasures
sensual desires[2]
in the world
are not lightly let go.

Those chained by desire,
bound by becoming's allure, aren't easily released
for there's no liberation by others.
Intent, in front or behind,[3] on hunger for sensual pleasures here or before—greedy
for sensual pleasures,
busy, deluded, ungenerous, entrenched in the discordant way,[4] they—impelled into pain—lament:
"What will we be when we pass on from here?"

So a person should train right here-&-now.
Whatever you know
as discordant in the world, don't, for its sake, act discordantly, for that life, the enlightened say, is short.

I see them,
in the world, floundering around, people immersed in craving for states of becoming.
Base people moan in the mouth of death, their craving, for states of becoming & not-,[5] unallayed.

See them,
floundering in their sense of mine, like fish in the puddles of a dried-up stream—
and, seeing this,
live with no mine,
not forming attachment
for states of becoming.
Subdue desire for both sides,[6]
comprehending[7] sensory contact, with no greed.

Doing nothing for which he himself
would rebuke himself, the enlightened person doesn't adhere to what's seen,
to what's heard.
Comprehending perception,
he'd cross over the flood—
the sage not stuck
on possessions.
Then, with arrow removed,
living heedfully, he longs for neither—this world,
the next.

vv. 772–779

Notes

1. Nd I: "Cave" = the body. "Covered heavily over" = having defilements and unskillful mental qualities.

2. "Sensual desires/sensual pleasures": two possible meanings of kāma. According to Nd I, both meanings are intended here.

3. Nd I: "In front" means experienced in the past (as does "before" two lines down); "behind" means to-be-experienced in the future.

4. Nd I: "The discordant (visama) way" means the ten types of unskillful action (see MN 41, MN 97, and AN 10:176). See also Sn 1:12, note 11.

5. States of not-becoming are oblivious states of becoming that people can get themselves into through a desire for annihilation, either after death or as a goal of their religious striving (see Iti 49 and MN 49). As with all states of becoming, these states are impermanent and stressful.

6. According to Nd I, "both sides" here has several possible meanings: sensory contact and the origination of sensory contact; past and future; name and form; internal and external sense media; self-identity and the origination of self-identity. It also might mean states of becoming and not-becoming, mentioned in the previous verse and below, in Sn 4:5.

7. Nd I: Comprehending sensory contact has three aspects: being able to identity and distinguish types of sensory contact; contemplating the true nature of sensory contact (e.g., inconstant, stressful, and not-self); and abandoning attachment to sensory contact. The same three aspects would apply to comprehending perception, as mentioned in the following verse.

4:3 The Corrupted Octet

There are some who dispute corrupted at heart,
and those who dispute
    their hearts set on truth, but a sage doesn't enter a dispute that's arisen, which is why he has no rigidity anywhere at all.

Now, how would one
    led on by desire,
    entrenched in his likes,
    forming his own conclusions, overcome his own views?
He'd dispute in line with the way that he knows.

Whoever boasts to others, unasked, of his practices, habits,
is, say the skilled,
ignoble by nature—
    he who speaks of himself of his own accord.

But a monk at peace, fully unbound in himself, not boasting of his habits
    —"That's how I am"—
he, say the skilled,
is noble by nature—
    he with no vanity
    anywhere in the world.

One whose doctrines aren't clean—fabricated, formed, given preference when he sees it to his own advantage—relies on a peace

    dependent
    on the provoked.[1]
Because entrenchments[2] in views aren't easily overcome
when considering what's grasped
among doctrines,
    that's why
a person embraces or rejects a doctrine—in light of these very entrenchments.

Now, one who is cleansed[3] has no theorized view about states of becoming or not-
    anywhere in the world.
Having abandoned conceit[4] & illusion, by what means would he go?[5]
        He isn't involved,
for one who's involved enters into disputes over doctrines.
But how—in connection with what[6]— would you argue
with one uninvolved?
    He has nothing embraced or rejected,[7] has sloughed off every view right here—every one.

vv. 780–787

Notes

1. Kuppa-paṭicca. Underlying many of the Canon's explanations of physical and mental phenomena is the theory of dhātu—element or property—in which phenomena are said to happen because an underlying dhātu, which normally exists in a potential form, is provoked into being actualized. Fires, for instance, come from the provocation of the fire dhātu that is everywhere present. When the provocation ends, the dhātu returns to its potential state, and the phenomenon ends. Thus any phenomenon that depends on provocation is by nature inconstant and unreliable. This is one of the reasons why the experience of full release is said to be unprovoked, because it does not depend on the provocation of a dhātu, and so is free from the potential for change. For more on this point, see MN 29, note 3.

2. Entrenchments: a rendering of the Pali term, nivesana, which can also be translated as dwelling (see Sn 1:12, note 5), abode, situation, home, or establishment.

Nd II illustrates the meaning of "entrenchments in views" with these ten views (found, in various forms, in DN 9, MN 72, and AN 10:93): "The cosmos is eternal. Only this is true; anything otherwise is worthless." "The cosmos is not eternal…" "The cosmos is finite…" "The cosmos is infinite…" "The soul & the body are the same…" "The soul is one thing & the body another…" "After death a Tathāgata exists…" "After death a Tathāgata does not exist…" "After death a Tathāgata both does & does not exist…" "After death a Tathāgata neither does nor does not exist. Only this is true; anything otherwise is worthless."

3. Nd I: Cleansed through discernment. See also the explanation of "washed" in Sn 3:6.

4. Nd I explains a variety of ways of understanding the word "conceit," the most comprehensive being a list of nine kinds of conceit: viewing people better than oneself as worse than oneself, on a par with oneself, or better than oneself; viewing people on a par with oneself as worse than oneself, on a par with oneself, or better than oneself; viewing people worse than oneself as worse than oneself, on a par with oneself, or better than oneself. In other words, the truth of the view is not the issue here; the issue is the tendency to compare oneself with others. See AN 6:49. See also AN 4:159.

5. Nd I: "By what means would he go" to any destination in any state of becoming.

6. "In connection with what": a rendering of the instrumental case that attempts to cover several of its meanings, in particular "by what means" and "in terms of what." For a discussion of the use of the instrumental case in the Aṭṭhaka Vagga, see Sn 4:9, note 4.

7. This reading follows the Thai, Sri Lankan, and PTS editions: attaṁ nirattaṁ. The Burmese edition reads, attā nirattā: "He has no self, nor what's opposed to self." As GD points out in its notes to the translation of this verse, the first reading is probably the correct one, as it relates to the poem's earlier reference to a person embracing or rejecting a doctrine. The fact that an awakened person is free from both embracing and rejecting is a recurring theme in this vagga and the next; the confusion at present in the various recensions as to whether similar lines should read attaṁ/nirattaṁ or attā/nirattā is a recurring textual theme as well. (See Sn 4:4, note 4; Sn 4:10, note 7; Sn 4:14, note 2.)

For a discussion of the conditions under which the Buddha would enter into a debate, see Skill in Questions, chapter 5.

4:4 The Pure Octet

"I see the pure, the supreme,
free from disease.
It's in connection with what's seen
that a person's purity
is."[1]
Understanding thus,
having known the "supreme," & remaining focused on purity,
one falls back on that knowledge.
If it's in connection with what is seen
that a person's purity is,
or if stress is abandoned
in connection with knowledge, then a person with acquisitions is purified
in connection with something else,[2] for his view betrays that in the way he asserts it.

No brahman[3]
says purity comes in connection
with anything else.
Unsmeared with regard to what's seen, heard, sensed, habits or practices,
merit or evil,
not creating

anything here,
he's let go
    of what he'd embraced.[4]

Abandoning   what's first, they depend on   what's next.[5] Following perturbation,[6] they don't cross over the bond.
They embrace & reject
    —like a monkey releasing a branch to seize at another[7]— a person undertaking practices on his own, goes high & low,
latched onto perception.
But having clearly known through vedas,[8] having encountered
    the Dhamma,
one deeply discerning doesn't go
    high & low.

He's enemy-free[9]
with regard to   all things
seen, heard, or sensed.
By whom, with what,[10]
should he be pigeonholed
here in the world?
    —one who has seen in this way, who goes around
                open.[11]

They don't theorize, don't yearn, don't proclaim "utter purity." Untying the tied-up knot of grasping, they don't form a desire anywhere in the world.

The brahman

gone beyond territories,[12] has nothing that —on knowing or seeing—he's grasped.
Unimpassionate for passion, not impassioned for dis-,[13] he has nothing here that he's grasped as supreme.

vv. 788–795

Notes

1. An ancient Indian belief, dating back to the Vedas, was that the sight of certain things or beings was believed to purify. Thus "in connection with what's seen" here means both that purity is brought about by means of seeing such a sight, and that one's purity is measured in terms of having such a sight. This belief survives today in the practice of darshan. See DN 16, note 44.

2. In other words, if purity were simply a matter of seeing or knowing something, a person could be pure in this sense and yet still have acquisitions (= defilements), which would not be true purity. On the use of the phrase, "in connection with," here, see Sn 4:9, note 4.

3. "Brahman" in the Buddhist sense, i.e., a person born in any caste who has become an arahant.

4. Lines such as this may have been the source of the confusion in the different recensions of the Canon—and in Nd I—as to whether the poems in this vagga are concerned with letting go of views that have been embraced (atta) or of self (attā). The compound here, attañjaho, read on its own, could be read either as "he's let go of what has been embraced" or "he's let go of self." However, the following image of a monkey seizing and releasing branches as it moves from tree to tree reinforces the conclusion that the first interpretation is the correct one.

5. Nd I: Leaving one teacher and going to another; leaving one teaching and going to another. This phrase may also refer to the mind's tendency to leave one craving to go to another.

6. For a discussion of unperturbed states of concentration, see MN 106.

7. "Like a monkey releasing a branch to seize at another"—an interesting example of a whole phrase that functions as a lamp, i.e., modifying both the phrase before it and the phrase after it.

8. "Vedas"—Just as the word "brahman" is used in a Buddhist sense above, here the word veda is given a Buddhist sense. According to SnA, in this context it means the knowledge accompanying four transcendent paths: the paths to stream-entry, once-returning, non-returning, and arahantship.

9. Nd I: The enemies here are the armies of Māra—all unskillful mental qualities. For a detailed inventory of Māra's armies, see Sn 3:2.

10. "By whom, with what"—two meanings of the one Pali word, kena.

11. Nd I: "Open" means having a mind not covered or concealed by craving, defilement, or ignorance. This relates to the many references in Sn to the idea of having one's roof opened up (see Sn 2:13, note 3). This is in contrast to the image discussed Sn 4:2, note 1.

12. Nd I: "Territories" = the ten fetters (saṁyojana) and seven obsessions (anusaya).

13. Nd I: "Passion" = sensuality; "dispassion" = the jhāna states that bring about dispassion for sensuality. However, this may also be a reference to the fact that dispassion is the highest dhamma, whether fabricated or unfabricated (Iti 90), and yet the arahant is described in Sn 5:6 as having transcended all phenomena. See AN 3:137, note 1 and Sn 4:6, note 2.

4:5 The Supreme Octet

When dwelling on views
    as "supreme,"
a person makes them
the utmost thing in the world, &, from that, calls
all others inferior
and so he's not gone beyond disputes.
When he sees his own advantage in what's seen, heard, sensed, or in habits & practices, seizing it there
he sees all else, all others,
                as inferior.

That, too, say the skilled,
is a binding knot: that in dependence on which you regard another
    as inferior.
So a monk shouldn't be dependent on what's seen, heard, or sensed, or on habits & practices;
nor should he theorize a view in the world
    in connection with knowledge or habits & practices;
shouldn't take himself
    to be "equal";
shouldn't think himself inferior or superlative.

Abandoning what he'd embraced,
    not clinging,

he doesn't make himself dependent even in connection with knowledge;
doesn't follow a faction
among those who are split;
doesn't fall back
on any view whatsoever.

One who isn't inclined toward either side
    —becoming or not-,
    here or beyond—
who has no entrenchment
when considering what's grasped among doctrines, hasn't the least theorized perception
with regard to what's seen, heard, or sensed.
By whom, with what,
should he be pigeonholed
here in the world?
    —this brahman
    who hasn't adopted views.

They don't theorize, don't yearn,
don't adhere even to doctrines.

A brahman not led by habits or practices, gone to the beyond
    —Such—
    doesn't fall back.

4:6 Old Age

How short this life!
You die this side of a century,
but even if you live past,
    you die of old age.

People grieve
for what they see as mine, for   nothing possessed is constant, nothing is constantly possessed.[1] Seeing this separation simply as it is,
one shouldn't follow the household life.

At death a person abandons what he supposes as mine.
Realizing this, the wise shouldn't incline
to be devoted to mine-ness.

Just as a man doesn't see on awakening
what he met in a dream, even so he doesn't see,
when they are dead
    —their time done—
those he held dear.

When they are seen & heard, people are called by this name or that,
but only the name remains to be pointed to
    when they are dead.

Grief, lamentation, & selfishness are not let go

by those greedy for mine, so sages
letting go of possessions, go about seeing the Secure.

A monk, living withdrawn, enjoying a dwelling secluded:
They say it's congenial for him,
he who wouldn't, in any realm, display self.

Everywhere
the sage
independent
makes nothing dear or undear.

In him
lamentation & selfishness, like water on a white lotus,
do not adhere.

As a water bead on a lotus leaf,
as water on a red lily,
doesn't adhere,

so the sage
doesn't adhere
to the seen, the heard, or the sensed;

for, cleansed,
he doesn't suppose
in connection with the seen, the heard, or the sensed.

In no other way
does he wish for purity, for he neither takes on passion nor puts it away.[2]

vv. 804–813

Notes

1. "Nothing possessed is constant, nothing is constantly possessed"—two readings of the phrase, na hi santi niccā pariggahā.

2. Nd I: An arahant has put passion totally away once and for all, and so has no need to do it ever again.

4:7 To Tissa-metteyya

Tissa-metteyya:

"Tell the damage, dear sir, for one given over
to sexual intercourse.
Having heard your teaching, we'll train in seclusion."

The Buddha:

"In one given over
to sexual intercourse,
the teaching is muddled
and he practices wrongly:
    This is ignoble
    in him.
Whoever once went alone,
but then resorts
to sexual intercourse
    —like a carriage out of control—is called vile in the world, a person run-of-the-mill.
His earlier honor & dignity:
        lost.
Seeing this,
he should train himself to abandon sexual intercourse.

Overcome by resolves,
    he broods
like a miserable wretch.
Hearing the scorn of others,
    he's chagrined.
He makes weapons,

attacked by the words of others.
This, for him, is a great entanglement.
    He sinks
    into lies.

    They thought him wise
when he committed himself to the life alone,
but now that he's given
to sexual intercourse
    they declare him a dullard.

Knowing these drawbacks, the sage here—before & after—stays firm in the life alone;
doesn't resort to sexual intercourse;
would train himself
in seclusion—
            this, for the noble,
            is highest.
He wouldn't, because of that,
suppose himself
to be better than others:
        He's on the verge
    of unbinding.

People enmeshed
in sensual pleasures,
envy him:
    a sage remote,
leading his life
unconcerned for sensual pleasures
    —one who's crossed over the flood."

4:8 To Pasūra

"'Only here is there purity'
—that's what they say—
'No other doctrines are pure'
—so they say.
Insisting that what they depend on is good,
they are deeply entrenched in idiosyncratic truths.[1]

Seeking controversy, they plunge into an assembly, regarding one another as fools.
Relying on others' authority, they speak in debate.
Desiring praise, they claim to be skilled.

Engaged in disputes in the midst of the assembly, —anxious, desiring praise—the one defeated is chagrined.
Shaken with criticism, he seeks for an opening.

He whose doctrine is [judged as] demolished, defeated, by those judging the issue:
He laments, he grieves—the inferior exponent.
'He beat me,' he mourns.

These disputes have arisen among contemplatives.
In them are elation,
dejection.
Seeing this, one should abstain from disputes, for they have no other goal than the gaining of praise.

While he who is praised there for expounding his doctrine in the midst of the assembly, laughs on that account & grows haughty, attaining his heart's desire.

That haughtiness will be grounds for his damage, for he'll speak in pride & conceit.
Seeing this, one should abstain from debates.
No purity is attained by them, say the skilled.

Like a strong man nourished on royal food, you prowl about, roaring, searching out an opponent.
Wherever the battle is,
go there, strong man.
As before, there's none here.

Those who dispute, taking hold of a view, saying, "This, and this only, is true," those you can talk to.
Here there is nothing—
no confrontation
at the birth of disputes.[2]

Whom would you gain as opponent, Pasūra, among those who live above confrontation—not pitting view against view—who have nothing here grasped as supreme?

So here you come,
conjecturing,
your mind thinking up
viewpoints.
You're paired off with a pure one and so cannot proceed."

vv. 824–834

Notes

1. Pacceka-sacca. The word pacceka can also mean singular, personal, or individual. AN 10:20 lists the following views as idiosyncratic truths. "The cosmos is eternal," "The cosmos is not eternal," "The cosmos is finite," "The cosmos is infinite," "The soul & the body are the same," "The soul is one thing & the body another," "After death a Tathāgata exists," "After death a Tathāgata does not exist," "After death a Tathāgata both does & does not exist," "After death a Tathāgata neither does nor does not exist." These truths are distinct from noble truths, in that the word for "noble"—ariya—can also mean "universal."

4:9 To Māgandiya

[Māgandiya, a brahman, offers his daughter to the Buddha, who replies:][1]

"On seeing [the daughters of Māra]
—Discontent, Craving, & Passion—there wasn't even the desire for sex.
So what would I want with this,
filled with urine & excrement?
I wouldn't want to touch it even with my foot."[2]

Māgandiya:

"If you don't want
this gem of a woman, coveted by many kings,
then for what sort of viewpoint,
habit, practice, life, attainment of [further] becoming do you argue?"

The Buddha:

"'I argue for this'
doesn't occur to one
when considering what's grasped
among doctrines.
Looking for what is ungrasped with regard to views,[3]
and detecting inner peace, I saw."

Māgandiya:

"Sage, you speak
of not grasping

at any theorized judgments.
This 'inner peace':
What does it mean?
    How is it,
by the enlightened,
    proclaimed?"

The Buddha:

"He doesn't speak of purity
in connection with   view,
                learning,
                knowledge,
                habit or practice.
Nor is it found by a person through lack of view,
            of learning,
            of knowledge,
            of habit or practice.[4] Letting these go, without grasping,
    at peace,
    independent,
one wouldn't long for becoming."

Māgandiya:

"Well, if he doesn't speak of purity
in connection with   view,
                learning,
                knowledge,
                habit or practice.
and it isn't found by a person
through lack of view,
            of learning,
            of knowledge,
            of habit or practice,[5]
it seems to me that this teaching's simply confused,
for some assume a purity in terms of

—by means of[6]—
a view."

The Buddha:

"Asking questions
dependent on view,
you're confused
by the things you have grasped.
And so you don't glimpse even the slightest notion
[of what I am saying].
That's why you think
it's confused.

Whoever supposes
'equal,'
'superior,' or
'inferior,'
by that he'd dispute;
whereas to one unaffected by these three,
'equal,'
'superior,'
do not occur.

Of what would the brahman say 'true' or 'false,'
with whom would he dispute?
With whom would he join in dispute, he in whom 'equal,' 'unequal' are not?

Having abandoned home,
living free from society,
the sage
in villages
creates no intimacies.
Remote from sensuality, not preferring,

he wouldn't engage with people in quarrelsome debate.[7]

Those things
aloof from which he should go about in the world:
The Nāga
wouldn't take them up & argue for them.

As the prickly lotus
is unsmeared by water & mud,
so the sage,
    an exponent of peace,
        without greed,
    is unsmeared by sensuality &
        the world.

An attainer-of-knowledge isn't measured made proud[8]
        by views or what's thought, for he isn't fashioned[9] of them.
He wouldn't be led by action,[10] learning; doesn't reach a conclusion in any entrenchments.

For one dispassionate toward perception
    there are no snares;
for one released by discernment,
        no
    delusions.
Those who grasp at perceptions & views go about clashing in the world."

vv. 835–847

Notes

1. This information is taken from SnA. The Sanskrit version of this sutta found in the Divyāvadāna provides the same basic information in a narrative much more elaborate than that in SnA. The Sanskrit translation of this sutta found in East Turkestan includes a short prose introduction that agrees in some details with the Divyāvadāna narrative, and in others with the SnA narrative.

2. Unfortunately, the sutta does not say what Māgandiya's daughter had done or thought to deserve such a sharp rebuke. See MN 58.

3. See AN 10:93.

4. Putting the first two sentences of this verse together and making sense of them is the major challenge for anyone trying to translate this poem. The reading given here is based on considerations of both grammar and context.

a) First, grammar: The Pali of the first sentence puts the words for "view, learning, knowledge, habit, & practice" in the instrumental case. This case stands for the relationship "by means of" or "because of" but it also has an idiomatic meaning: "in terms of." (To keep the translation neutral on this point, I have translated with the idiom, "in connection with," which can carry both possibilities.) The second sentence puts the words for lack of view, etc., in the ablative case, which carries the meaning "because of" or "from."

If we assume that the instrumental case in the first sentence is meant in the sense of "by means of," then we are dealing—as Māgandiya asserts—with plain nonsense: The first sentence would say that a person cannot achieve purity by means of views, etc., while the second sentence would be saying that he cannot achieve purity by means of no view, etc.

The fact that the two sentences place the relevant terms in different grammatical cases, though, suggests that they are talking about two different kinds of relationships. If we take the instrumental in the first sentence idiomatically in the sense of "in terms of," then the verse not only makes sense but also fits in with teachings of the rest of the Pali suttas: A person cannot be said to be pure simply because he/she holds to a particular view, body of learning, etc. Purity is not defined in those terms. The second sentence goes on to say that a person doesn't arrive at purity from a lack of view, etc. Putting the two sentences together with the third, the message is this: One uses right views, learning, knowledge, habits, & practices as a path, a means for arriving at purity. Once one arrives, one lets go of the path, because the purity of inner peace, in its ultimate sense, is something transcending the means by which it is reached.

b) The immediate context of this verse supports this interpretation. The Buddha's initial statement here is an answer, not to the question of how the goal is attained, but to Māgandiya's question of how an enlightened person would describe the goal. The Buddha responds by contradicting the general views current in his time as to how such a state would be defined, and so in this context the meaning of "in terms of" makes the most immediate sense. Then, having shown that description isn't helpful, the Buddha goes on to discuss the most useful thing that can be said about such a state: how to get there.

However, in the verse immediately following this one, it's obvious that Māgandiya has not caught this distinction and so misses the Buddha's point.

For further illustrations of the role of right view in taking one to a dimension beyond all views, see AN 10:93, AN 10:96, MN 22 (in particular, the simile of the raft), and MN 24. (The analogy of the relay coaches in MN 24 actually seems more tailored to the issues raised by the Buddha's remarks in this sutta than it does to the question it addresses in that one.) See also sections III/H and III/H/i in The Wings to Awakening.

Nd I, without explaining the grammatical word play at work in this verse, offers an interpretation in line with the one offered in this note: On the one hand, it says, one doesn't describe purity or release in terms of view, etc. On the other, one cannot attain inner peace without using a measure of right view, learning, knowledge, habit (virtue), and practice. It defines right view in terms of mundane right view, described in MN 117; learning in terms of the voice of another (AN 2:124) and the nine traditional divisions of Dhamma in the Canon: dialogues, narratives of mixed prose and verse, explanations, verses, spontaneous exclamations, quotations, birth stories, amazing events, question & answer sessions (AN 7:64); knowledge in terms of knowledge of what has been done by action, knowledge in line with the four noble truths, the knowledge of the six forms of direct knowing (AN 5:28), and knowledge of the nine concentration attainments (AN 9:33); habit (virtue) in terms of restraint in the Pāṭimokkha (AN 10:17); and practice in terms of eight of the dhutaṅga practices: living in the wilderness, going for alms, wearing cast-off cloth, wearing only one triple set of robes, bypassing no donors on one's alms round, refusing food brought afterwards, not lying down, and accepting whatever lodging one is assigned (see Thag 16:7 and SN 16:5). It is important to note that Nd I does not insist that all these practices and forms of knowledge, etc., must be completely mastered to attain inner peace. Instead, it insists that a "measure" (matta) be mastered, without defining how large that measure must be.

5. The lines of this verse up to this point are clearly missing in the text of the Sanskrit version found in East Turkestan. Hoernle, the scholar who first studied the text, concluded that the lines in the Pali here must have been a later interpolation, but it's also possible that the Sanskrit was either a faulty translation or an accurate translation based on a faulty transmission of the text.

6. "In terms of—by means of": Two ways of interpreting the instrumental case in this sentence.

7. A long explanation of this verse, attributed to Ven. Mahā Kaccāna, is contained in SN 22:3. The main points are these:

"The property of form, householder, is the home of consciousness. When consciousness is in bondage through passion to the property of form, it is said to be living at home. The property of feeling… perception… fabrication is the home of consciousness. When consciousness is in bondage through passion to the property of fabrication, it is said to be dwelling at home.

"And how does one not live at home? Any desire, passion, delight, craving, any attachments, clingings, fixations of awareness, biases, or obsessions with regard to the property of form: These the Tathāgata has abandoned, their root destroyed, made like a palmyra stump, deprived of the conditions of development, not destined for future arising. Therefore the Tathāgata is said to be not dwelling at home.

[Similarly with the remaining aggregates.] …

"And how does one live free from society? The Tathāgata has abandoned bondage to the distraction of the society of form-impressions, its root destroyed, made like a palmyra stump, deprived of the conditions of development, not destined for future arising. Therefore the Tathāgata is said to be living free from society.

[Similarly with the society of sound-impressions, aroma-impressions, flavor-impressions, tactile-sensation-impressions, and idea-impressions.]

"And how is one not intimate in villages? There is the case where a monk lives unentangled with householders. Not delighting together with them, not sorrowing together with them, not happy when they are happy, not pained when they are pained, he does not take on any of their arisen business affairs as his own duty. This is how one is not intimate in villages.…

"And how is one remote from sensuality? There is the case where a certain person is free of passion for sensuality, free of desire, free of love, free of thirst, free of fever, free of craving for sensuality. This is how one is remote from sensuality.…

"And how is one free from preferences? There is the case where a certain person does not think, 'May form be like this in the future. May feeling.… May perception.… May fabrication.… May consciousness be like this in the future.' This is how one is free from preferences.…

"And how does one not engage with people in quarrelsome debate? There is the case where a certain person is not a fomenter of this kind of debate: 'You understand this doctrine & discipline? I'm the one who understands this doctrine & discipline. How could you understand this doctrine & discipline? You're practicing wrongly. I'm practicing rightly. What should be said first you said last. What should be said last you said first. I'm being consistent. You're not. What you took so long to think out has been refuted. Your doctrine has been overthrown. You're defeated. Go and try to salvage your doctrine, or extricate yourself if you can!' This is how one does not engage with people in quarrelsome debate."

8. "Measured … made proud"—two meanings of the Pali word mānameti.

9. To be fashioned by something is to define oneself around it. See MN 78, note 2; and MN 113. For discussions of the role of non-fashioning in the practice, see The Wings to Awakening, II/B and III/G, and The Paradox of Becoming, chapter 6.

10. "Action" here can mean either kamma in a restricted sense, as ritual action, or in its general sense, meaning that the attainer-of-knowledge has gone beyond creating seeds of kamma that will lead to further becoming (see AN 3:34). According to Nd I, "action" here denotes the three types of fabrication (abhisaṅkhāra): meritorious (ripening in pleasure), demeritorious (ripening in pain), and imperturbable (the formless attainments)—see DN 33.

4:10 Before the Break-up (of the Body)

"Seeing how,
behaving how,
is one said to be
    at peace?
Gotama, tell me about
    —when asked about—
    the ultimate person."

The Buddha:

"Free from craving
before the break-up [of the body],
independent
    of before
    & the end, [1]
not classified in between, [2] no preference is his.

Un-   angered,
un-   startled,
un-   boastful,
un-   anxious,
giving counsel unruffled,
        he is a sage,
    his speech
    under control.

Free from attachment
with regard to the future, not sorrowing
over the past,
he sees seclusion

in the midst of sensory contacts.[3] He can't be led in terms of views.[4]

Withdrawn, undeceitful, not stingy, not miserly, not insolent, in-offensive,
he doesn't engage in divisive speech.

Not drunk on enticements, nor given to pride,
he's gentle, quick-witted, beyond conviction & dispassion.[5]

Not in hopes of material gain does he take on the training; when without material gain
he isn't upset.

Unobstructed by craving, he doesn't through craving[6] hunger for flavors.

Equanimous—always—mindful, he doesn't suppose himself
equal,
superior,
inferior,
in the world.
No swellings of pride
are his.

Whose dependencies
don't exist
when, on knowing the Dhamma, he's independent;

in whom no craving is found for becoming or not-:
    He is said
    to be at peace,
        un-intent
        on sensual pleasures, with nothing at all
    to tie him down:
one who's crossed over attachment.

He has no children
        cattle,
        fields,
        land.
In him you can't pin down what's embraced or rejected.[z]
He has no preference
for that which people run-of-the-mill or brahmans & contemplatives might blame—
    which is why
he is unperturbed
with regard to their words.

His greed gone,
not miserly,
    the sage
doesn't speak of himself
as among those who are higher,
    equal,
or lower.

    He,
theory-free,
goes to no theory.
For whom

nothing in the world
is his own,
who doesn't grieve
over what is not,
who doesn't enter into doctrines phenomena[8]:
He is said
to be
at peace."

vv. 848–861

Notes

1. Nd I: "Independent of before & the end" = no craving or view with regard to past or future.

2. For discussions of how the awakened one cannot be classified even in the present, see MN 72 and SN 22:85–86.

3. Nd I: "He sees seclusion in the midst of sensory contacts" = he sees contact as empty of self. This passage may also refer to the fact that the awakened person experiences sensory contact as if disjoined from it. On this point, see MN 140 and MN 146, quoted in The Mind Like Fire Unbound, chapter 4.

4. See AN 10:93.

5. Beyond conviction & dispassion—The Pali here can also mean, "A person of no conviction, he does not put away passion." This is an example of the kind of pun occasionally used in Pali poetry for its shock value. Other examples are at Dhp 97 and the end of Sn 4:13. For examples of what is meant by being beyond conviction, see SN 12:68 and SN 48:44. For an explanation of what is meant by being beyond dispassion, see Sn 4:6, note 2. An alternate explanation is that, as Sn 5:6 indicates, the arahant is beyond all dhammas, dispassion included.

6. The Pali word taṇhāya—by/through craving—functions here as a lamp.

7. This reading follows the Thai and PTS editions: attaṁ vā-pi nirattaṁ vā. The Burmese and Sri Lankan editions read, attā vā-pi nirattā vā: "self or what's opposed to self." The first reading seems preferable for two reasons: First, it follows the theme established in Sn 4:3 and Sn 4:4 (and also followed in Sn 4:15 and Sn 5:11) that the awakened person has gone beyond embracing or rejecting views. Second, the word nirattā is found nowhere else in the Canon aside from the two other verses in Sn (4:3 and 4:14) where it is offered as a possible alternative reading for niratta (released, rejected). As niratta is clearly the preferable alternative in Sn 4:3, I have adopted it here and in Sn 4:14 as well.

8. "Doctrines, phenomena"—two meanings of the Pali word, dhamma.

4:11 Quarrels & Disputes

"From where have there arisen
quarrels, disputes,
lamentation, sorrows, along with stinginess,
conceit & pride, along with divisiveness?
From where have they arisen?
Please tell me."

"From what is dear
there have arisen
quarrels, disputes,
lamentation, sorrows, along with stinginess,
conceit & pride, along with divisiveness.
Tied up with stinginess are quarrels & disputes.
In the arising of disputes is divisiveness."

"Where is the cause
of things dear in the world,
along with the greeds that go about in the world?
And where is the cause of the hopes & aims
for the sake of a person's next life?"

"Desires are the cause
of things dear in the world,
along with the greeds that go about in the world.
And here too is the cause of the hopes & aims
for the sake of a person's next life."

"Now where is the cause of desire in the world?
And from where have there arisen decisions, anger, lies, & perplexity, and all the qualities described by the Contemplative?"

"What they call
'appealing' &
'unappealing'
in the world:
In dependence on that,
    desire arises.
Having seen becoming & not-
with regard to forms,
a person gives rise to decisions in the world;
anger, lies, & perplexity:
    these qualities, too,
    when there exists
    that very pair.
A person perplexed
should train for the path of knowledge, for it's in having known that the Contemplative has spoken of qualities/dhammas."[1]

"Where is the cause
of appealing & un-?
When what isn't
do they not exist?
And whatever is meant
by becoming & not- :
    Tell me,
    Where is their cause?"

"Contact is the cause
of appealing & un-.
When contact isn't,
they do not exist,
along with what's meant
by becoming & not- :
    I tell you,

from here is their cause."

"Now where is the cause
of contact in the world,
and from where have graspings, possessions, arisen?
When what isn't
does there not exist mine-ness?
When what has disappeared do contacts not touch?"

"Conditioned by name-&-form is contact.
In longing do graspings, possessions have their cause.
When longing isn't,
mine-ness doesn't exist.
When forms have disappeared contacts don't touch."

"For one how-arriving
does form disappear?
How do pleasure & pain disappear?
Tell me this.
My heart is set on knowing how they disappear."

"One not percipient of perceptions not percipient of aberrant perceptions, not unpercipient,
nor percipient of what's disappeared[2]:
For one thus-arriving,
form disappears[3]—
for objectification-classifications[4] have their cause in perception."

"What we have asked,
you've expounded to us.
We ask one thing more.

Please tell it.
Do some of the wise
say that just this much is the utmost,
that purity of spirit[5] is here?
Or do they say that it's other than this?"

"Some of the wise
say that just this much is the utmost,
that purity of spirit is here.
But some of them,
who say they are skilled,
say it's the moment
with no clinging remaining.

But knowing,
'Having known, they still are dependent,'[6]
the sage ponders dependencies.
On knowing them, released,
he doesn't get into disputes, doesn't meet with becoming & not-
: He's enlightened."

vv. 862–877

Notes

1. As other passages in this poem indicate (see note 6, below), the goal is not measured in terms of knowledge, but as this passage points out, knowledge is a necessary part of the path to the goal.

2. According to Nd I, "percipient of perceptions" means having ordinary perceptions. "Percipient of aberrant perceptions" means being insane. "Unpercipient" means either having entered the cessation of perception and feeling (see AN 9:33) or the dimension of beings without perception (DN 1 and DN 15). "Percipient of what's disappeared" (or: having perceptions that have disappeared) means having entered any of the four formless states. Of these four explanations, the last is the least likely, for as the next lines show, this passage is describing the stage of concentration practice in which one is transcending the fourth jhāna and entering the formless attainment of the infinitude of space. A more likely explanation of "percipient of what's disappeared" would be the act of holding to perceptions of the breath and of pleasure and pain, even though these phenomena have all disappeared in the fourth jhāna (see SN 36:11, AN 9:31, AN 10:20, and AN 10:72).

3. This is the point where the meditator leaves the fourth jhāna and enters the perception of the infinitude of space.

4. Objectification-classifications (papañca-saṅkhā): Nd I defines papañca simply as craving, views, and conceit. A survey of how the term papañca is actually used in the suttas, however, shows that it denotes the mind's tendency to objectify itself as a being. Then, from that objectification, it searches for nourishment to keep that being in existence, classifying experience in terms conducive to that search and thus giving rise to conflict. As Sn 4:14 points out, the root of the objectification-classifications is the perception, "I am the thinker." For further discussion of this point, see note 1 to that sutta and the introduction to MN 18.

5. "Spirit" is the usual rendering of the Pali word, yakkha. According to Nd I, however, in this context the word yakkha means person, individual, human being, or living being.

6. In other words, the sage knows that both groups in the previous verse fall back on their knowledge as a measure of the goal, without comprehending the dependency still latent in their knowledge. The sages in the first group are mistaking the experience of neither perception nor non-perception as the goal, and so they are still dependent on that state of concentration. The sages in the second group, by the fact that they claim to be skilled, show that there is still a latent conceit in their experience of not-clinging, and thus it is not totally independent of clinging. (For more on this point, see MN 102.) Both groups still maintain the concept of a "spirit" that is purified in the realization of purity. Once these dependencies are comprehended, one gains release from disputes and from states of becoming and not-becoming. It is in this way that knowledge is a means to the goal, but the goal itself is not measured or defined in terms of knowledge.

4:12 The Lesser Array

"Dwelling on their own views, quarreling,
different skilled people say:
'Whoever knows this, understands Dhamma.
Whoever rejects this, is imperfect.'
Thus quarreling, they dispute:
'My opponent's a fool & unskilled.'
Which of these statements is true when all of them say they are skilled?"

"If, in not accepting an opponent's doctrine, one's a fool, a beast of inferior discernment, then all are fools of inferior discernment—all of these who dwell on their views.
But if, in siding with a view, one's cleansed,
with discernment made pure, sensible, skilled,
then none of them
are of inferior discernment, for all of them
have their own views.

I don't say, 'That's how it is,'
the way fools tell one another.
They each make out their views to be true and so regard their opponents as fools."

"What some say is true

—'That's how it is'— others say is 'falsehood, a lie.'
Thus quarreling, they dispute.
Why can't contemplatives say one thing & the same?"

"The truth is one,[1]
there is no second about which a person who knows it would argue with one who knows.
Contemplatives promote their various own truths, that's why they don't say one thing & the same."

"But why do they say various truths,
those who say they are skilled?
Have they learned many various truths or do they follow conjecture?"

"Apart from their perception there are no
many various constant truths
in the world.[2]
Theorizing conjectures
with regard to views,
they speak of a pair: true & false.
Dependent on what's seen,
heard,
& sensed,
dependent on habits & practices,
one shows disdain [for others].
Taking a stance on his decisions, praising himself, he says,
'My opponent's a fool & unskilled.'

That by which he regards his opponents as fools is that by which he says he is skilled.
Calling himself skilled,
he despises another
who speaks the same way.

Agreeing on a view gone out of bounds, drunk with conceit, imagining himself perfect, he has consecrated, with his own mind,
himself
as well as his view.

If, by an opponent's word, one's inferior,
the opponent's
of inferior discernment as well.
But if, by one's own word one's an attainer-of-knowledge, enlightened, no one among contemplatives
is a fool.

'Those who approve of a doctrine other than this are lacking in purity,
imperfect.'
That's what the many sectarians say, for they're smitten with passion for their own views.
'Only here is there purity,'
that's what they say.
'In no other doctrine is purity,' they say.
That's how the many sectarians are entrenched, speaking firmly there concerning their own path.
Speaking firmly concerning your own path,

what opponent here would you take as a fool?
You'd simply bring strife on yourself if you said your opponent's a fool with an impure doctrine.

Taking a stance on your decisions, & yourself as your measure, you dispute further down into the world.

But a person who's abandoned all decisions creates no strife
in the world."

vv. 878–894

Notes

1. "The truth is one": This statement should be kept in mind throughout the following verses, as it forms the background to the discussion of how people who theorize their conjectures speak of the pair, true and false. The Buddha is not denying that there is such a thing as true and false, or that some statements correspond more truly to reality than others. He avoids defending his own teachings in debates, not because there are many different truths, but because—as he says in Sn 4:8, the purpose of debates is not to arrive at truth but to gain praise. In this way, it encourages the debater to get entrenched in his views. All entrenched views, regardless of how true or false their content might be, behave in line with the truth of conditioned phenomena as explained in the preceding sutta. They lead to conceit, conflict, and states of becoming. When they are viewed in this way—as events in a causal chain rather than as true or false depictions of other events (or as events rather than signs)—the tendency to hold to or become entrenched in them is diminished. This allows for a practitioner to hold to the truths of right view for the sake of putting an end to suffering and stress, and then to put aside any attachment to those truths once they have performed their duty. On this point, see MN 22 and AN 10:93, and the essay, "Truths with Consequences."

2. On the role of perception in leading to conflicting views, see the preceding sutta.

4:13 The Great Array

"Those who, dwelling on views, dispute, saying, 'Only this is true':
    Do they all incur blame, or also earn praise there?"

"[The praise:] It's such a small thing, not at all appeasing.[1]
I speak of two fruits of dispute; and seeing this, you shouldn't dispute—seeing the state where there's no dispute as secure.

One who knows
doesn't enter into any conventions
born of the run-of-the mill
    at all.
One who's uninvolved:
When he's forming no predilection for what's seen, for what's heard, why would he get involved?[2]

Those for whom habits are ultimate
say that purity's
a matter of self-restraint.
Undertaking a practice, they devote themselves to it:
    'Let's train just in this,
    and then there would be purity.'
Those who say they are skilled are [thus] led on to becoming.

But if one of them falls from his habits or practice, he trembles,
having failed in his actions.
He hopes for, longs for, purity, like a caravan leader   lost far from home.

But one who's abandoned habits & practices[3]
            —all—
things that are blamable, blameless,[4] not hoping for 'pure' or 'impure,'[5] would live in kindness & peace, without taking up peace,[6] detached.

Dependent
on taboos, austerities, or what's seen, heard, or sensed, they speak of purity
through wandering further on through becoming & not-, their craving not gone
for becoming & not-.[7]
For one who aspires has longings & trembling with regard to theorizings.
But one who here
has no passing away & arising:
Why would he tremble?
For what would he long?"

"The teaching some say is 'supreme,'
is the very one others call 'lowly.' Which statement is true when all of these claim to be skilled?"

"They say their own teaching is perfect while the doctrine of others is lowly.

Thus quarreling, they dispute,
each saying his agreed-on opinion is true.
If something, because of an opponent's say-so,
were lowly,
then none among teachings would be superlative,
for many say
that another's teaching's inferior when firmly asserting their own.
If their worship of their teaching were true,
in line with the way they praise their own path, then all doctrines would be true—
for purity's theirs, according to each.

The brahman has nothing led by another,
when considering what's grasped
among doctrines.
Thus he has gone
beyond disputes,
for he doesn't regard as best the knowledge of a doctrine, any other doctrine.[8]

'I know. I see. That's just how it is!'—
Some believe purity's in terms of view.
But even if a person has seen,
what good does it do him?
Having slipped past,
they speak of purity
in connection with something or somebody else.
A person, in seeing,
sees name-&-form.
Having seen, he'll know

only these things.
No matter if he's seen little, a lot,
the skilled don't say purity's in connection with that.

A person entrenched in his teachings, preferring a theorized view, isn't easy to discipline.
Whatever he depends on
he describes it as lovely,
says that it's purity,
  that there he saw truth.

The brahman, evaluating, doesn't enter into a theory, doesn't follow views,
isn't tied even to knowledge.[9]
And on knowing whatever's conventional, commonplace, he remains equanimous:
  'That's what others hold onto.'

Having untied the knots
here in the world,
the sage here in the world[10]
doesn't follow a faction
when disputes have arisen.
At peace among those not at peace, he's equanimous, doesn't hold on:
  'That's what others hold onto.'

Giving up old effluents, not forming new,
neither pursuing desire,
nor entrenched in his teachings, he's totally released
from viewpoints,
  enlightened.

He doesn't adhere to the world,

is without self-rebuke;
is enemy-free[11]
with regard to all things
seen, heard, or sensed.

His burden laid down,
the sage totally released is improper :: is theory-free hasn't stopped :: isn't impassioned isn't worth wanting :: doesn't desire,"[12]

the Blessed One said.

vv. 895–914

Notes

1. Or: Not enough to appease (the defilements, says Nd I).

2. A Sanskrit version of this verse is quoted by Asaṅga in the Bodhisattvabhūmi (48.24).

3. Nd I: Abandoning habits & practices in the sense of no longer believing that purity is measured in terms of them, the view discussed in the preceding verse. See MN 79.

4. Nd I: "Blamable, blameless" = black and white kamma (see AN 4:232, 234, 237–238, quoted in The Wings to Awakening, section I/B.

5. Nd I: Having abandoned impure mental qualities, and having fully attained the goal, the arahant has no need to hope for anything at all.

6. "In kindness & peace, without taking up peace"—a pun on the word, santimanuggahaya.

7. The word bhavabhavesu—"through/for becoming & not-becoming"—functions here as a lamp.

8. "The knowledge of a doctrine, any other doctrine"—a pun on the word, dhammamaññam. Nd I favors the second interpretation, saying that the brahman does not see as best any doctrine aside from the Wings to Awakening: the establishings of mindfulness, the exertions, the bases of power, the faculties, the strengths, the factors for awakening, and the noble eightfold path. This reading seems unlikely, though, as these doctrines are not mentioned anywhere in this poem. The first reading is more in line with the Buddha's statement in

Sn 4:9 that the highest state is not defined in terms of knowledge, and is well-illustrated in action in AN 10:93.

9. According to Nd I, this compound—ñāṇa-bandhu—should be translated as "tied by means of knowledge," in that the arahant doesn't use the knowledge that comes with the mastery of concentration, the five mundane forms of psychic power (abhiññā), or any wrong knowledge to create the bonds of craving or views. However, the compound may also refer to the fact that the arahant isn't tied even to the knowledge that forms part of the path to arahantship (see MN 117).

10. "In the world" functions as a lamp here.

11. See Sn 4:4, note 9.

12. "Is improper :: is free from theories, hasn't stopped :: isn't impassioned, isn't worth wanting :: doesn't desire"—a series of puns—na kappiyo, nuparato, na patthiyo—each with a strongly positive and a strongly negative meaning, probably meant for their shock value. For a similar set of puns, see Dhp 97.

4:14 Quickly

"I ask the Kinsman of the Sun, the Great Seer, about seclusion & the state of peace.
Seeing in what way is a monk unbound, clinging to nothing in the world?"

"He should put an entire stop to the root of objectification-classifications:

'I am the thinker.'[1]

He should train, always mindful, to subdue any craving inside him.
Whatever truth he may know,
within or without,
he shouldn't, because of it,
make himself hardened,
for that isn't called unbinding by the good.
He shouldn't, because of it, think himself better,
lower, or
equal.
Touched by contact in various ways,
he shouldn't keep theorizing about self.
Stilled right within,
a monk shouldn't seek peace from another,
from anything else.
For one stilled right within,
there's nothing embraced,
so how rejected?[2]

As in the middle of the sea it is still,

with no waves upwelling, so the monk—unperturbed, still—should not swell himself
    anywhere."

"He whose eyes are open has described the Dhamma he's witnessed, subduing danger.
Now tell us, sir, the practice:
the Pāṭimokkha & concentration."

"One shouldn't be careless with his eyes, should close his ears to village-talk, shouldn't hunger for flavors, or view anything in the world as mine.
When touched by contact,
he shouldn't lament,
shouldn't covet anywhere any states of becoming,
or tremble at terrors.
When gaining food & drink,
            staples & cloth,
    he should not make a hoard.
Nor should he be upset
when receiving no gains.
Doing jhāna,   not footloose, he should refrain   from restlessness, shouldn't be   heedless,
should live   in a noise-less abode.
Not making much of sleep, ardent, given to wakefulness,
he should abandon weariness, deception, laughter, sports,
    sexual intercourse,
    & all that goes with it;
should not practice casting spells,[3] interpret dreams, physical marks, the stars, animal cries;

should not be devoted to doing cures or inducing fertility.

A monk shouldn't tremble at blame or grow haughty with praise; should dispel stinginess, greed, divisive speech, anger;
shouldn't buy or sell
or revile anyone anywhere;
shouldn't linger in villages,
or flatter people in hope of gains.

A monk shouldn't boast or speak with ulterior motive, shouldn't train in insolence or speak quarrelsome words; shouldn't engage in lies or knowingly cheat;
shouldn't despise others for their life,
discernment,
habits,
or practices.
Annoyed on hearing many words from contemplatives
or ordinary people,
he shouldn't respond harshly,
for those who retaliate aren't calm.

Knowing this teaching,
a monk inquiring
should always train in it mindfully.
Knowing unbinding as peace,
he shouldn't be heedless of Gotama's message—
for he, the Conqueror unconquered, witnessed the Dhamma,

not by hearsay,
but directly, himself.
So, heedful, you should always do homage & train in line with that Blessed One's message,"

the Blessed One said.[4]

vv. 915–934

Notes

1. On objectification-classifications and their role in leading to conflict, see Sn 4:11 and the introduction to MN 18. The perception, "I am the thinker" lies at the root of these classifications in that it identifies oneself as a being. Because a being requires food, both physical and mental (see SN 12:63–64 and Khp 4), this creates conflict with others seeking food. Because an identity as a being also involves attachment (see SN 23:2), this perception involves internal conflict as well, as whatever one identifies with will inevitably change. The conceit inherent in this perception thus forms a fetter on the mind. To become unbound, one must learn to examine this perception—to see that it is simply an assumption that is not inherent in experience, and that we would be better off learning how to drop it.

2. This reading follows the version of the verse given in the Thai edition of Nd I, as well as an alternative reading given as a footnote to the Sri Lankan edition of Sn 4:14: n'atthi attaṁ kuto nirattaṁ vā. The Burmese and Sri Lankan editions of this verse read, n'atthi attā kuto nirattā vā: "There is no self, so how what's opposed to self?" The Thai edition of Sn 4:14 reads, n'atthi attā kuto nirattaṁ vā: "There is no self, so how what's rejected?" This last reading makes no sense; the Burmese and Sri Lankan readings depend on the notion that nirattā is an actual word, although it appears nowhere in the Canon except in two other verses of the Aṭṭhaka Vagga, where it is cited as a possible alternative to niratta (Sn 4:3 and Sn 4:10). Because the Buddha in SN 44:10 refuses to take the position that there is no self, and because he says in MN 2 that the questions, "Do I exist? Do I not exist?" are unworthy of attention, all of the readings of this verse that say n'atthi attā would appear to be wrong. Thus I have adopted the reading given here.

3. Āthabbaṇa. Some scholars have identified this term with the Atharvaveda, but the identification is uncertain. It could also be a generic term for casting spells and curses of any sort. Nd I interprets this term simply as referring to spells for bringing about calamities and diseases for one's enemies.

4. The Chinese version of the Aṭṭhaka Vagga adds, at the end of this sutta, the verses in Sn 1:9.

4:15 The Rod Embraced

“When embraced,
the rod of violence[1]
    breeds danger & fear:
Look at people in strife.
    I will tell how
    I experienced terror:
Seeing people floundering like fish in small puddles, competing with one another—as I saw this,
    fear came into me.
The world was entirely without substance.
All the directions
    were knocked out of line.
Wanting a haven for myself,
I saw nothing that wasn’t laid claim to.
Seeing nothing in the end but competition,
I felt discontent.
                And then I saw
an arrow here,
    so very hard to see,
    embedded in the heart.
Overcome by this arrow
you run in all directions.
But simply on pulling it out you don’t run,
    you don’t sink.[2]

[Here the trainings are recited.] [3]

Whatever things are tied down in the world, you shouldn't be set on them.
Having totally penetrated
sensual pleasures,
sensual passions,[4]
you should train for your own
unbinding.

Be truthful, not insolent, not deceptive, remote from divisiveness.
Without anger, the sage should cross over the evil of greed & avarice.
He should conquer drowsiness,
weariness,
sloth;
shouldn't consort with heedlessness, shouldn't stand firm in his pride—the man with his heart set on unbinding.

He shouldn't engage in lying,
shouldn't create affection for form, should fully fathom conceit,
and live refraining from impulsiveness;
shouldn't delight in what's old, prefer what's new,[5]
grieve over decline, get entangled in what's dazzling & bright.[6]

I call greed
a great flood;
hunger, a swift current.
Preoccupations are ripples;
sensuality, a bog

hard to cross over.
Not deviating from truth,
a sage stands on high ground
: a brahman.[7]

Having relinquished
in every way,
he is said to be
at peace;
having clearly known, he is an attainer-of-knowledge; knowing the Dhamma, he's
independent.
Moving rightly through the world,
he doesn't envy
anyone here.

Whoever here has gone beyond
sensual passions—
an attachment hard to transcend in the world—doesn't sorrow,
doesn't fret.
He, his stream[8] cut, is free
from bonds.

Burn up what's before,
and have nothing for after.
If you don't grasp
at what's in between,[9]
you will go about, calm.

For whom, in name-&-form,
in every way,
there's no sense of mine,
and who doesn't grieve
over what is not:
He, in the world,
isn't defeated,

suffers no loss.[10]

To whom there doesn't occur
'This is mine,'
for whom nothing is others':
He, feeling no sense of mine-ness, doesn't grieve at the thought
'I have nothing.'

Not harsh,
not greedy,
not perturbed,[11]
everywhere
concordant[12]:
This is the reward
—I say when asked—
for those who are free from theorizing.

For one unperturbed
—who knows—
there's no accumulating.
Abstaining, unaroused,
he everywhere sees security.[13]
The sage
doesn't speak of himself
as among those who are higher,
equal,
or lower.
At peace, free of stinginess, he doesn't embrace, doesn't reject,"
the Blessed One said.

vv. 935–954

Notes

1. Nd I: The rod of violence takes three forms: physical violence (the three forms of bodily misconduct), verbal violence (the four forms of verbal misconduct), and mental violence (the three forms of mental misconduct). See AN 10:176 and Dhp 129–142.

2. Nd I: "One doesn't run" to any of the destinations of rebirth; "one doesn't sink" into any of the four floods of sensuality, views, becoming, and ignorance. See SN 1:1, SN 45:171, and AN 4:10.

3. This phrase, a kind of stage direction, seems to indicate that this poem had a ritual use, as part of a ceremony for giving the precepts.

4. "Sensual pleasure, sensual passions": two meanings of the word kāma.

5. Nd I: "Old" and "new" mean past and present aggregates.

6. Nd I: "what's dazzling & bright" = craving and other defilements.

7. See AN 7:15.

8. Nd I: The stream here stands for craving and the various defilements that arise in its wake. See Dhp 251, 337, 339–340, and 347. It could also stand for the stream of becoming, mentioned in Sn 3:12.

9. Nd I: "Before," "after," and "in between" = past, future, and present.

10. "Isn't defeated, suffers no loss"—two meanings of the Pali phrase, na jiyyati.

11. Nd I defines "perturbation" as meaning "craving," and "unperturbed" as meaning unmoved by gain, loss, status, loss of status, praise, criticism, pleasure, or pain (see AN 8:6–7). However, when the Buddha discusses the meaning of "unperturbed" in Sn 5:3, he relates it to the practice of concentration. See Sn 5:3, note 5.

12. Sama. See Sn 1:12, note 11.

13. See Ud 2:10.

4:16 To Sāriputta

Ven. Sāriputta:
"Never before
have I seen or heard from anyone
of a teacher with such lovely speech come, together with his following from Tusita heaven,[1]
as the One with Eyes
who appears to the world with its devas, having dispelled all darkness, having arrived at delight all alone.

To that One Awakened—unentangled, Such, un-
    deceptive,
    come with his following—I have come desiring a question on behalf of the many here who are fettered:
For a monk disaffected, frequenting a place remote—
    the root of a tree,
    a cemetery,
    in mountain caves
    various places to stay—
how many are the fears there at which he shouldn't tremble —there in his noiseless abode—how many the dangers in the world for the monk going the direction he never has gone over which he should prevail there in his isolated abode?

What should be
the ways of his speech?
What should be
his range there of action?
What should be
a resolute monk's
habits & practices?[2]
Undertaking what training — mindful, astute, alone — would he blow away
his own impurities
as a silver smith,
those in molten silver?"

The Buddha:

"I will tell you
as one who knows,
what is comfort
for one disaffected
if he's resorting to a place remote, desiring self-awakening
in line with the Dhamma.
An enlightened monk,
living circumscribed,
mindful,
shouldn't fear the five fears:
of horseflies, mosquitoes, snakes, human contact, four-footed beings;
shouldn't be fazed
by those following another's teaching even on seeing their manifold threats;
should prevail over still other further dangers

as he seeks what is skillful.

Touched
    by the touch
of disease, hunger,
he should endure cold & inordinate heat.
He with no home,
in many ways touched by these things, striving, should make firm his persistence.

He shouldn't commit a theft, shouldn't speak a lie,
should touch with thoughts of goodwill beings firm & infirm.
Conscious of when his mind is stirred up & turbid, he should dispel it:
    'It's on the side of the Dark One.'

He shouldn't come under the sway of anger or pride.
Having dug up their root
he would stand firm.
Then, when prevailing
    —yes—
he'd prevail over notions of dear & undear.

Deferring   to discernment enraptured   with what's admirable, he should overcome these dangers,
should conquer
                discontent
                in his isolated spot, should conquer
                these four thoughts of lament:

    'What will I eat,

or where will I eat?
How badly I slept.
Tonight where will I sleep?'

These lamenting thoughts he should subdue—
one under training,
wandering without home.
Receiving food & cloth
at appropriate times,
he should have a sense of enough for the sake of contentment.[3] Guarded in regard to these things going restrained into a village, even when harassed
he shouldn't say a harsh word.

With eyes downcast, & not footloose,
committed to jhāna,
he should be continually wakeful.[4] Arousing equanimity, centered within,
he should cut off any penchant to conjecture or worry.
When reprimanded with words, he should—mindful—
rejoice;[5]
should smash any rigidity toward his fellows in the holy life; should utter skillful words that are not untimely;
should give no mind
to the gossip people might say.

And then there are in the world the five kinds of dust
for whose subduing, mindful,

he should train:
With regard to forms, sounds, tastes,
smells, & tactile sensations
    he should conquer passion;
with regard to these things
    he should subdue his desire.

A monk, mindful,
his mind well released,
contemplating the right Dhamma at the right times, on coming to oneness[6]
    should annihilate darkness,"

the Blessed One said.

V : The To-the-Far-Shore Chapter (Pārāyana Vagga)

Introduction

Sixteen brahman ascetics—students of a teacher named Bāvarī—approach the Buddha with questions on the goal of his teaching and how to attain it. From their questions, it is obvious that some of them, at least, are quite advanced in their meditation practice. Tradition tells us that the first fifteen of the ascetics attained arahantship immediately after the Buddha answered their questions. As for the sixteenth—Piṅgiya—Nd II tells us that after his questions were answered he attained the Dhamma Eye, a term that usually means stream-entry. The commentary to Nd II, however, interprets it as meaning that he became a non-returner.

A recurrent image in these dialogues is of life as a flood—a flood of birth, aging, and death; sorrow and lamentation; stress and suffering. The purpose of spiritual practice is to find a way across the flood to the safety of the far shore. This image explains the frequent reference to finding a way past entanglements—the flotsam and jetsam swept along by the flood that may prevent one's progress; and to the desire to be without acquisitions—the unnecessary baggage that could well cause one to sink midstream.

There is evidence that these sixteen dialogues were highly regarded right from the very early centuries of the Buddhist tradition. As concise statements of profound teachings particular to Buddhism, they sparked an attitude of devotion coupled with the desire to understand their more cryptic passages. Most of Nd II, a late addition to the Pali Canon, is devoted to explaining them in detail. Five suttas—one in the Saṁyutta Nikāya, four in the Aṅguttara—discuss specific verses in the set, and a sixth sutta (AN 7:53) tells of a lay woman who made a practice of rising before dawn to chant the Pārāyana—apparently the full set of sixteen dialogues. Whether the Prologue and Epilogue had been added to the sixteen dialogues by her time or were added later, no one knows.

Unlike the Aṭṭhaka Vagga, there is no extant version of the Pārāyana Vagga in any other Buddhist Canon. However, several Sanskrit Buddhist texts quote passages from the individual suttas it contains; and the Chinese Canon contains at least thirteen passages that refer to the Pārāyana Vagga and/or quote passages from it.

So the Pārāyana is characterized by many of the same features that are used to argue for the antiquity of the Aṭṭhaka. However, the case for its antiquity is rarely pressed, perhaps because 5:3–4, 5:7, 5:10–11, and 5:16 center on the issue of how to avoid rebirth. If the Aṭṭhaka and Pārāyana are indeed early records of the Buddha's teachings, the Pārāyana would thus act as a necessary supplement to the Aṭṭhaka in that, unlike the Aṭṭhaka, it explains why clinging and becoming are dangerous: They lead to the suffering of rebirth.

The discussions offered by the five suttas that quote the Pārāyana Vagga show that even in cases where the meaning of a verse seems, on first reading, fairly straightforward, the culture in which they were composed encouraged looking for meanings that were not at all obvious on the surface. For example, the last verse in 5:3 does not explicitly mention concentration practice, and only hints at it in using the phrase "nothing perturbing," but the interpretations that the Buddha himself offers in AN 3:32 and AN 4:41 state that the verse was actually referring to very advanced states of concentration practiced together with discernment. These explanations should serve as warning that the culture of the time gave a framework for understanding the verses that at present we can only guess at—a chastening thought. To help bridge the cultural gap, the notes to this translation offer extensive quotations from the five suttas mentioned above, along with explanations from Nd II and the commentaries both to Sn and to Nd II where these seem useful.

V : The To-the-Far-Shore Chapter (Pārāyana Vagga)

Prologue

From the delightful city of the Kosalans, a brahman [Bāvarī]
who had mastered mantras, aspiring to nothingness,[1]
went to the Southern country.
He, in the land of Assaka,
the neighborhood of Muḷaka,
on the bank of the Godhāvarī, lived on gleanings & fruits.
Close by was a large village.
And with the income from that village he performed a great sacrifice.
Having sacrificed the great sacrifice,
he returned again to his ashram.

As soon as he had entered there, another brahman came along:
    thirsty, with scratched feet,
    dirty teeth,
    dusty head.
On arrival, he asked Bāvarī for five hundred [pieces of money].
Bāvarī, on seeing him, invited him to sit down, asked after what is pleasant & skillful,
and said these words:

"Whatever of mine
that could be given away,
I have disposed of entirely.
Forgive me, brahman,
I don't have five hundred."

"If you don't hand over to me when I ask,
within seven days,
may your head split into seven pieces."

Dissembling, the imposter proclaimed threats.
Hearing his words,
Bāvarī was distressed.
He wasted away, taking no food, afflicted with the arrow of grief,
and, with his mind this way,
his heart found no delight in jhāna.

Seeing him nervous & distressed,
a devatā wishing his welfare, approached Bāvarī
and said these words:
"That imposter, wanting money, doesn't discern heads;
has no knowledge of heads or the splitting of heads."

Bāvarī:

"You, sir, surely know.
Explain to me when asked:
heads & the splitting of heads.
I will listen to your words."

The devatā:

"I too don't know that.
I don't have that knowledge.
Heads & the splitting of heads:

That is surely the insight of Victors."

Bāvarī:

"Then who knows surely in this circle of the earth,
heads & the splitting of heads?
Explain that to me, devatā."

The devatā:

"Gone forth from the city of Kapilavatthu,
the chief of the world,
a descendant of King Okkāka,
a Sakyan-son, a bringer of light:
He, brahman, is Rightly Self-Awakened, gone to the far shore of all dhammas;
attainer of all direct knowledges & strengths, one with an Eye that sees all
dhammas;
attainer of the end of all action,
released in the ending of acquisitions.
He, the One with Eyes,
awakened, blessed,
teaches the Dhamma.
Going to him, you ask him.
He will answer you."

Hearing the word "Self-Awakened," Bāvarī was exultant.
His grief subsided,
and he gained abundant rapture.
So Bāvarī, gratified, exultant, excited, asked the devatā:
"In which village or town, or in which country
is the protector of the world?
Going where can we pay homage to the Self-Awakened One, supreme among two-footed beings?"

The devatā:

"In Sāvatthī, the Kosalan city, is the Victor of vast discernment, of foremost deep intelligence.
He, a matchless Sakyan-son, effluent-free, a bull among men, is an expert in the splitting of heads."
Then Bāvarī addressed his students, brahmans who had mastered the mantras,
"Come, students, I will explain.
Listen to my words.
He whose appearance in the world
is hard often to gain,
has today arisen in the world, renowned as Self-Awakened.
Going quickly to Sāvatthī, see the one supreme among two-footed beings."

The students:

"But how, brahman, on seeing him, will we know for sure that he's the One Self-Awakened?
Tell us, who don't know, how we will know him."

Bāvarī:

"There have come down in the mantras
the marks of a Great Man.
Thirty-two are described in all,
step by step.
One in whose body
are the marks of a Great Man has two destinations.
There isn't a third.

If he dwells in a home,
he will conquer this world —without rod, without sword, but with righteousness—
he will rule.
But if he goes forth
from home into homelessness, with his roof opened up,[2]
he will be Self-Awakened, a worthy one unexcelled.
Ask just in your heart
about my caste & clan,
mantras, other students,
and about heads
& the splitting of heads.
If he is awakened,
seeing without obstruction,
he will answer in speech the questions asked in your heart."

Having heard Bāvarī's words, sixteen brahman students—
Ajita, Tissa-metteyya,
Puṇṇaka & Mettagū,
Dhotaka & Upasīva,
Nanda & Hemaka,
Todeyya & Kappa,
the wise Jatukaṇṇin,
Bhadrāvudha & Udaya,
Posāla the brahman,
Mogharāja the intelligent,
and Piṅgiya the great seer—
all with their own groups, famed in all
the world,
endowed with jhāna,
delighting in jhāna,

enlightened,
perfume with perfumes[3]
from previous lives, having bowed down to Bāvarī and performed circumambulation, left, setting out for the North, wearing coiled hair & deer-skins:
first to the establishment of Muḷaka, then to Māhissatī, Ujjenī, Gonaddhā, Vedisā, Vanasa,
to Kosambī & Sāketa,
to Sāvatthī, the supreme city,
to Setabya, Kapilavatthu, the city of Kusinārā,
to Pāva, Bhoganagara,
to Vesālī, the city of the Magadhans, and then to the Pāsāṇaka shrine, refreshing & lovely.

Like a thirsty man for cool water, like a merchant for a great profit, like one burning from heat
for shade,
quickly they climbed the mountain.
And at that time, the Blessed One, surrounded by the Saṅgha of monks, was teaching the monks the Dhamma, like a lion roaring in the forest.
Ajita saw the Self-Awakened One, like the sun with radiance in beams,[4] like the moon come to fullness on the fifteenth day.
Then, seeing the marks
complete in his body,
he stood to one side, overjoyed, and in his heart asked the questions:

"Speak concerning his birth, speak of his clan & marks, speak of his perfection in the mantras, and how many brahmans does he teach?"

The Buddha:

"His age is one hundred & twenty,
and by clan, he is a Bāvarī.
Three are the marks in his body,
three the Vedas he's mastered.
In the marks & oral traditions, etymologies & rituals,
he teaches five hundred.
In his own doctrine
he has reached perfection."

Ajita:

"Proclaim them in detail—Bāvarī's marks—
    O man supreme,
    cutter of craving, don't leave us in doubt."

The Buddha:

"He can hide his face with his tongue,
he has a tuft of hair between his brows, his male organ is in a sheath:
    Know this, young brahman."

Not hearing anything asked, but hearing the questions answered,
all the people, excited,
with hands palm-to-palm over their hearts, thought:
"What deva or Brahmā, or Inda Sujampati[5]
asked those questions in his heart?
To whom did he [the Buddha] reply?"

Ajita:

"Bāvarī asked about heads and the splitting of heads.
Explain that, Blessed One.
Subdue our doubt, seer."

The Buddha:

"Know the head to be ignorance, and the splitting of the head, knowledge connected with conviction, mindfulness, concentration, desire, & persistence."

Then, with great joy,
the young brahman,
putting himself in order,
arranging his deer-skin over one shoulder, fell with his head at the Blessed One's feet:
"Master, One with Eyes,
Bāvarī the brahman,
together with his students, dear sir—exultant in mind, happy at heart—venerate your feet."

The Buddha:

"May he be happy,
Bāvarī the brahman,
together with his students.
And may you, too, be happy, young brahman,
and live a long time.
All doubts—
Bāvarī's
and all of yours:
Ask, now that I've given leave, whatever you wish in your heart."

Given leave by the Self-Awakened One, having sat to one side, hands palm-to-palm over his heart,

Ajita there addressed the first question
to the Tathāgata.

vv. 976–1031

Notes

1. Reading ākiñcāññaṁ with the Thai text of Nd II and of SnA. The Thai text of the prologue here reads āciññaṁ, "practice, custom." According to SnA, "nothingness" here means freedom from care. However, it might also mean the meditative state of the dimension of nothingness, and the post-mortem deva realm corresponding to that attainment. This would fit in with the fact that, in the following dialogues, two of his students—Upasīva and Posāla—appear to be familiar with this dimension in their meditation, and quiz the Buddha as to what to do after having attained it.

2. See Sn 2:13, note 3.

3. "Perfume" (vāsanā) here means traces of good qualities.

4. Following GD in interpreting vīta- here as meaning "straight."

5. "Lord of the Well-born," an epithet for Sakka, king of the devas of the Thirty-three.

5:1 Ajita's Questions

With what is the world shrouded?
Because of what doesn't it shine?
With what is it smeared? Tell me.
What
is its great danger & fear?

The Buddha:

With ignorance
the world is shrouded.
Because of stinginess,
heedlessness,[1]
it doesn't shine.
With longing
it's smeared—I tell you.
Suffering-stress:
its great danger & fear.

Ajita:

They flow every which way,
the streams.[2]
What is their blocking,
what their restraint—tell me—
with what are they finally stopped?

The Buddha:

Whatever streams
there are in the world:
Their blocking is mindfulness, mindfulness is their restraint—I tell you—

with discernment
they're finally stopped.

Ajita:

Discernment & mindfulness, name-&-form, dear sir:
Tell me, when asked this,
where are they brought to a halt?

The Buddha:

This question you've asked, Ajita, I'll answer it for you—where name-&-form
are brought to a halt
without trace:
With the cessation of consciousness they're here brought to a halt.[3]

Ajita:

Those here who have fathomed the Dhamma, those who are learners,
those who are run-of-the-mill:
When you, dear sir, astute,
are asked this,
tell me their manner of life.[4]

The Buddha:

He
should not hanker
for sensual pleasures,
should be limpid in mind.
Skilled in all mental qualities, he, the monk, should wander mindfully.

vv. 1032–1039

Notes

1. The Thai edition notes that this word, in terms of the meter of the line, is excessive.

2. According to Nd II, the streams that 'flow every which way' are the streams of craving, views, conceit, defilement, corruption, and ignorance that flow out the six sense media. The first two lines in the translation of Ven. Ajita's second set of questions (the first half-line in the Pali) is identical to the first half-line in Dhp 340.

3. See DN 11, DN 15, MN 49, and SN 12:67. Asaṅga, in the Yogācārabhūmi, quotes a Sanskrit translation of this sutta that inserts at this point the final question and answer, on the topic of how consciousness is brought to a halt, occurring at the end of the Pali version of Sn 5:13. A manuscript found in Turfan contains a Sanskrit version of this sutta that inserts the same question at the same point, and includes traces of other insertions as well.

4. In SN 12:31, the Buddha quotes this question to Ven. Sāriputta and asks him to answer it. With a little prodding, Ven. Sāriputta gives this extended answer, on which the Buddha places his seal of approval:

"One sees with right discernment that 'this has come into being.' Seeing with right discernment that 'this has come into being,' one practices for disenchantment with, for dispassion toward, for the cessation of what has come into being. One sees with right discernment that 'it has come into being from this nutriment.' Seeing with right discernment that 'it has come into being from this nutriment,' one practices for disenchantment with, for dispassion toward, for the cessation of the nutriment by which it has come into being. One sees with right discernment that 'from the cessation of this nutriment, what has come into being is subject to cessation.' Seeing with right discernment that 'from the cessation of this nutriment, what has come into being is subject to cessation,' one practices for disenchantment with, for dispassion toward, for the cessation of what is subject to cessation. This is how one is a learner.

"And how is one a person who has fathomed the Dhamma?

"One sees with right discernment that 'this has come into being.' Seeing with right discernment that 'this has come into being,' one is—through disenchantment, dispassion, cessation, through lack of clinging/sustenance—released from what has come into being. One sees with right discernment that 'it has come into being from this nutriment.' Seeing with right discernment that 'it has come into being from this nutriment,' one is—through disenchantment, dispassion, cessation, through lack of clinging/sustenance—released from the nutriment by which it has come into being. One sees with right discernment that 'from the cessation of this nutriment, what has come into being is subject to cessation.' Seeing with right discernment that 'from the cessation of this nutriment, what has come into being is subject to cessation,' one is—through disenchantment, dispassion, cessation, through lack of clinging/sustenance—released from what is subject to cessation. This is how one is a person who has fathomed the Dhamma."

5:2 Tissa-metteyya's Questions

Who
here in the world
is contented?
Who
has no agitations?
What thinker
knowing both sides,
doesn't adhere in between?
Whom
do you call a great person?
Who here
has gone past
the seamstress?—
craving.

The Buddha:

He who
in the midst of sensualities, follows the holy life,
always mindful, craving-free;
the monk who is
—through fathoming things—
unbound:
He has no agitations. He,
the thinker
knowing both sides,
doesn't adhere in between.[1] He I call a great person. He here has gone past
the seamstress: craving.[2]

vv. 1040–1042

Notes

1. AN 6:61 reports a discussion among several elder monks as to what is meant in this poem by "both sides" and "in between." Six of the elders express the following separate opinions:

a) Contact is the first side, the origination of contact the second side, and the cessation of contact is in between.

b) The past is the first side, the future the second, and the present is in between.

c) Pleasant feeling is the first side, painful feeling the second, and neither-pleasant-nor-painful feeling is in between.

d) Name (mental phenomena) is the first side, form (physical phenomena) the second, and consciousness is in between.

e) The six internal sense media (eye, ear, nose, tongue, body, intellect) are the first side, the six external sense media (sights, sounds, aromas, flavors, tactile sensations, ideas) the second side, and consciousness is in between.

f) Self-identity is the first side, the origination of self-identity the second, and the cessation of self-identity is in between.

The issue is then taken to the Buddha, who states that all six interpretations are well-spoken, but the interpretation he had in mind when speaking the poem was the first.

On the cessation of contact, see SN 35:117.

2. The image of craving as a seamstress also appears in Thag 14:2.

5:3 Puṇṇaka's Questions

To the one unperturbed, who has seen the roots,[1]
I have come with a question.
Because of what
have many human seers
    —noble warriors, brahmans—offered sacrifices to devas
here in the world?[2]
I ask you, Blessed One.
Please tell me.

The Buddha:

Those many human seers
    —noble warriors, brahmans—
who have offered sacrifices to devas
here in the world, Puṇṇaka, hoping for more of this state of being,
    offered their sacrifices because of aging.

Puṇṇaka:

These many human seers
    —noble warriors, brahmans—
who have offered sacrifices to devas
here in the world:
                Have they, Blessed One, heeding the path of sacrifice, dear sir, crossed over birth & aging?
I ask you, Blessed One.
Please tell me.

The Buddha:

They hoped for, liked,
longed for,
so they sacrificed—
they longed for sensuality, dependent on gain.
I tell you:
Those who take on the yoke of sacrifice, impassioned with
the passion for becoming,
have not crossed over birth & aging.[3]

Puṇṇaka:

If those who take on the yoke of sacrifice haven't crossed over birth & aging, then who in the world, dear sir, of beings divine & human
has crossed over birth & aging?
I ask you, Blessed One.
Please tell me.

The Buddha:

He who has fathomed
the high & low in the world, for whom there is nothing perturbing in the world—evaporated,[4] undesiring, untroubled, at peace—
he, I tell you, has crossed over birth & aging.[5]

vv. 1043–1048

Notes

1. Nd II cites three main ways in which the Buddha has seen the roots:

a) He has seen that greed, aversion, and delusion are the roots of what is unskillful, and that lack of greed, lack of aversion, and lack of delusion are the roots of what is skillful. Nd II anchors this point with a reference to AN 6:39, although its quote from that sutta contains two phrases not present in the sutta. Where AN 6:39 reads, "It's through action born of non-greed, action born of non-aversion, action born of non-delusion that devas are discerned, that human beings are discerned, or any other good destinations," Nd II reads, "It's through action born of non-greed, action born of non-aversion, action born of non-delusion that devas are discerned, that human beings are discerned, or any other good destinations for the production of a self-state [attabhāva] in a deva or a human being." Where AN 6:39 reads, "It's through action born of greed, action born of aversion, action born of delusion that hell is discerned, that the animal womb is discerned, that the realm of hungry ghosts is discerned, or any other bad destinations," Nd II reads "It's through action born of greed, action born of aversion, action born of delusion that hell is discerned, that the animal womb is discerned, that the realm of hungry ghosts is discerned, or any other bad destinations for the production of a self-state in hell, in the animal womb, or in the realm of hungry ghosts." If we assume that the extra phrases were originally not present in AN 6:39, the question arises as to why they were added in Nd II. One possible reason is that the compilers of Nd II may have been bothered by AN 6:39's suggestion that its list of good and bad destinations was not complete —e.g., that there could be other good destinations aside from the realms of devas and human beings—so they tried to close off that possibility.

b) The Buddha has seen further that all unskillful qualities are rooted in ignorance (here Nd II quotes a passage from SN 20:1: "All qualities that are unskillful, that have a share in what's unskillful, that side with what's unskillful, are rooted in ignorance and converge in ignorance. From the uprooting of ignorance, they are all uprooted"). The Buddha has also seen that all skillful qualities are rooted in heedfulness (here Nd II quotes a passage found in SN 45:79–80, SN 45:82, and SN 46:31: "All qualities that are skillful, that have a share in what's skillful, that side with what's skillful, are rooted in heedfulness, converge in heedfulness, and heedfulness is foremost among them").

c) The Buddha has also seen that ignorance is the root of all the factors of dependent co-arising.

For another sense in which the Buddha has seen the root, see MN 1.

2. See Sn 3:4 for another answer to a very similar question.

3. On the issue of rebirth in the suttas, see The Truth of Rebirth.

4. According to Nd II, this means that one's bodily, verbal, and mental misconduct have evaporated away, along with all one's defilements.

5. AN 3:32 and AN 4:41 contain discussions of the last verse in this poem.

In AN 3:32, Ven. Ānanda asks the Buddha, "Could it be that a monk could attain a concentration of such a sort such that, with regard to this conscious body, he would have no 'I'-making or 'mine'-making or obsession with conceit, such that with regard to all external themes [topics of concentration] he would have no 'I'-making or 'mine'-making or obsession with conceit, and that he would enter & remain in the awareness-release & discernment-release in which there is no 'I'-making or 'mine'-making or obsession with conceit?"

The Buddha answers that it is possible, and that such a concentration can be attained when one is percipient in this way: "This is peace, this is exquisite—the pacification of all fabrications; the relinquishing of all acquisitions; the ending of craving; dispassion; cessation; unbinding." He then adds that it was in connection to this state of mind that he uttered the last verse in this poem.

In AN 4:41, the Buddha identifies four ways of developing concentration: "There is the development of concentration that, when developed & pursued, leads to a pleasant abiding in the here-&-now. There is the development of concentration that, when developed & pursued, leads to the attainment of knowledge & vision. There is the development of concentration that, when developed & pursued, leads to mindfulness & alertness. There is the development of concentration that, when developed & pursued, leads to the ending of the effluents." The Buddha then adds that he uttered the last verse of this poem in connection with these four ways of developing concentration.

Although the verse does not mention concentration explicitly, the use of the phrase, "nothing perturbing" is apparently a reference to the states of concentration called imperturbable. See MN 102, note 2, and MN 106, note 1.

5:4 Mettagū's Questions

I ask you, Blessed One.
Please tell me.
I regard you as an attainer-of-knowledge, developed in mind.
From what have the many forms of stress
arisen in the world?

The Buddha:

You ask me
the source of stress.
I'll tell it to you
as one who discerns.
From acquisition[1] as cause
the many forms of stress
come into being in the world.
Whoever, unknowing,
makes acquisitions
—the dullard—
comes to stress
again & again.
Therefore, discerning,
you shouldn't create acquisitions
as you stay focused on the birth & origin of stress.[2]

Mettagū:

What we asked, you've expounded.
Now we ask something else.
Please tell us.
How do the enlightened cross over the flood of birth & aging,

lamentation & sorrow?
Please, sage, declare this to me
as this Dhamma has been known by you.

The Buddha:

I will expound to you Dhamma
—here-&-now,
not quoted words—
knowing which, living mindfully, you'll cross over beyond entanglement in the world.

Mettagū:

And I relish, Great Seer, that Dhamma supreme,
knowing which, living mindfully,
I'll cross over beyond
entanglement in the world.

The Buddha:

Whatever you're alert to,
above, below,
across, in between[3]:
Dispelling any delight,
any entrenchment
in those things,
consciousness should not take a stance in becoming.[4]
The monk who dwells thus —mindful, heedful—
letting go of his sense of mine, knowing right here would abandon
birth & aging,
lamentation & sorrow,
stress.

Mettagū:

I relish, Gotama, the Great Seer's words
well-expounded, without acquisition, for yes, Blessed One,
you've abandoned stress
as this Dhamma has
been known by you.
And they, too, would abandon stress those whom you, sage,
would admonish unceasingly.
Having met you, I bow down to you, Nāga.
Perhaps you will admonish me unceasingly.

The Buddha:

Whoever you recognize as a brahman, an attainer-of-knowledge possessing nothing,
unentangled
in sensuality & becoming—yes, he has crossed over this flood.
Having crossed to the far shore, he's free from rigidity, free
from doubt.

And anyone who has realized, who is an attainer-of-knowledge here, having unentangled the bond to becoming and non-,[5] free of craving,
untroubled,
undesiring—he,
I tell you, has crossed over birth & aging.

vv. 1049–1060

Notes

1. On the meaning of "acquisition," see Sn 3:12, note 2.

2. This verse is identical with the second set of verses in Sn 3:12.

3. Nd II gives six different valid interpretations for 'above, below, across, in between':

a) above = the future; below = the past; across and in between = the present,

b) above = the deva world; below = hell; across and in between = the human world,

c) above = skillfulness; below = unskillfulness; across and in between = indeterminate mental qualities,

d) above = the property of formlessness; below = the property of sensuality; across and in between = the property of form,

e) above = feelings of pleasure; below = feelings of pain; across and in between = feelings of neither pleasure nor pain,

f) above = the body from the feet on up; below = the body from the crown of the head on down; across and in between = the middle of the body.

4. On unestablished consciousness, see SN 12:38, SN 12:63–64, SN 22:53–54, and 22:87. See also the discussion of this topic in The Paradox of Becoming, chapter 7.

5. Becoming and non-becoming (or dis-becoming) are the two most subtle objects of craving that lead on to continued existence—and suffering—in the round of birth and death. See Ud 3:10, Iti 49, and MN 49, note 10. See also, The Paradox of Becoming.

5:5 Dhotaka's Questions

I ask you, Blessed One.
Please tell me.
I hope for your words, Great Seer.
Having heard your pronouncement, I'll train for my own
    unbinding.

The Buddha:

In that case,
be ardent—astute & mindful right here.
Then, having heard my pronouncement, train for your own
    unbinding.

Dhotaka:

I see in the world of beings divine & human,
a brahman who lives
possessing nothing.
    I pay homage to him,
    the All-around Eye.[1]
From my perplexities, Sakyan, release me!

The Buddha:

No one in the world, Dhotaka, can I release from perplexity.
But knowing the most excellent Dhamma, you will cross over this flood.

Dhotaka:

Teach with compassion, brahman, the Dhamma of seclusion

so that I may know—
so that I, unafflicted as space, may go about right here,
independent,
at peace.

The Buddha:

I will expound to you peace
—here-&-now,
not quoted words—
knowing which, living mindfully, you'll go beyond
entanglement in the world.

Dhotaka:

And I relish, Great Seer,
that peace supreme,
knowing which, living mindfully,
I'll go beyond
entanglement in the world.

The Buddha:

Whatever you're alert to,
above, below,
across, in between:
Knowing it as a bond in the world, don't create craving
for becoming or non-.[2]

vv. 1061–1068

Notes

1. See Sn 2:12, note 2.

2. Craving for becoming and non-becoming are the two most subtle forms of craving that lead to continued existence—and suffering—in the round of birth and death. See Sn 5:4, note 5.

5:6 Upasīva's Questions

Alone, Sakyan, with nothing to rely on,
I can't venture across the great flood.
Tell me, All-around Eye, the support to rely on for crossing over this flood.

The Buddha:

Mindfully focused on nothingness,[1] relying on 'There isn't,'
you should cross over the flood.
Abandoning sensuality, abstaining from conversations, keep watch for the ending of craving, night & day.

Upasīva:

One free from passion
for all sensuality
relying on nothingness, letting go of all else,
released in the highest emancipation of perception:
Does he stay there unaffected?

The Buddha:

One free from passion
for all sensuality
relying on nothingness, letting go of all else,
released in the highest emancipation of perception:
He stays there unaffected.

Upasīva:

If, All-around Eye, he stays there, unaffected for many years,

right there
would he be cooled & released?
Would his consciousness be like that?[2]

The Buddha:

As a flame overthrown by the force of the wind goes to an end
that cannot be classified,[3]
so the sage freed from the name-body[4]
goes to an end
that cannot be classified.

Upasīva:

One who has reached the end:
Does he not exist,
or is he for eternity
free from dis-ease?
Please, sage, declare this to me
as this phenomenon has been known by you.

The Buddha:

One who has reached the end
has no criterion[5]
by which anyone would say that—[6]
for him it doesn't exist.
When all phenomena are done away with,[7]
all means of speaking are done away with as well.

vv. 1069–1076

Notes

1. "Nothingness" here denotes the dimension of nothingness, one of the four levels of mental absorption on formless themes. One attains this level, after surmounting the dimension of the infinitude of consciousness, by focusing on the perception, "There is nothing." MN 26 tells us that Āḷāra Kālāma, the Buddha's first teacher when the latter was still a Bodhisatta, had attained this level of mental absorption and had thought that it was the highest possible attainment. The Bodhisatta left him upon realizing that it was not true liberation from stress and suffering. Nevertheless, the dimension of nothingness can be used as a basis for the insight leading to that liberation. On this point, see Sn 5:14, below, and AN 9:36. On the strategy of relying on the formless states to cross over the flood, see MN 52, MN 106, MN 111, and AN 9:36.

2. Reading bhavetha viññāṇaṁ tathāvidhassa with the Thai edition, interpreting tathāvidhassa as an elision of tathāvidhaṁ (of that sort) and assa (his). The Burmese and Sri Lankan editions read cavetha (would fall; would die) instead of bhavetha (would be). It's also possible to read tathāvidhassa as the genitive form of tathāvidha. Combined with cavetha, this would yield: Would the consciousness of such a one fall?

3. For a discussion of this passage in light of early Buddhist theories of fire, see The Mind Like Fire Unbound, chapter 1.

4. Nāma-kāya = mental activities of all sorts.

5. For a discussion of the meaning of "criterion" in this passage, see The Mind Like Fire Unbound, chapter 1. On the Tathāgata as being undescribable, see Skill in Questions, chapter 8 and appendix 4.

6. Reading vajjā (he would say/one would say), with the Sri Lankan edition. The Thai has vajju, which is irregular; the Burmese, vajjaṁ (they would say). Vajjā seems to be the best reading here for at least three textual reasons: (a) It fits into the meter better than vajjaṁ. (b) There has been no mention of any "they" up to this point in the dialogue. (c) The same line appears in SN 1:20, and there all the major editions of the Canon read vajjā.

From an interpretive standpoint, vajjā allows for the Buddha's answer to respond both to Upasīva's explicit question—does such a person not exist, or is he for eternity free from disease?—and for his implicit one: What has the Buddha's own experience been of this state? Reading vajjā as meaning "one would say," the answer tells of how the state of the person in question would appear to someone else. Reading it as meaning "he would say," the answer tells of how the person himself would describe the experience of that state. In neither case is there any criterion by which anyone could say, looking from within or without, that such a person doesn't exist or that he exists for eternity free from disease.

7. This is one of the passages in the Canon that treats unbinding, not as a phenomenon (dhamma), but as the end of phenomena. On this point, see AN 3:137, note 1.

5:7 Nanda's Questions

There are in the world
sages, they say
—in what way?
Do they call one a sage for possessing knowledge or possessing a way of life?

The Buddha:

Not on account of his views,
learning,
or knowledge
do the skilled here, Nanda, call one a sage.
Those who live
disarmed,
undesiring,
untroubled:
Those, I say, are called sages.

Nanda:

Whatever brahmans & contemplatives
describe purity
in terms of views & learning,
describe purity
in terms of habits & practices,
describe purity
in terms of manifold ways:
Have they, dear sir, living there in that way,
crossed over birth & aging?
I ask you, Blessed One.
Please tell me.

The Buddha:

Whatever brahmans & contemplatives
describe purity
in terms of views & learning,
describe purity
in terms of habits & practices,
describe purity
in terms of manifold ways:
None of them, living there in that way,
I tell you, have crossed over birth & aging.

Nanda:

Whatever brahmans & contemplatives
describe purity
in terms of views & learning,
describe purity
in terms of habits & practices,
describe purity
in terms of manifold ways:
If, sage, as you say,
they've not crossed over the flood,
then who in the world
of beings divine & human, dear sir,
has crossed over birth & aging?
I ask you, Blessed One.
Please tell me.

The Buddha:

I don't say that all brahmans & contemplatives are shrouded in birth & aging.
Those here who've abandoned
what's seen, heard, & sensed, habits & practices[1]
—all—
who've abandoned their manifold ways
—again, all—
who, comprehending craving,
are effluent-free:
They are the ones, I tell you, who've crossed over the flood.

Nanda:

I relish, Gotama, the Great Seer's words
well-expounded, without acquisition.
Those here who've abandoned
    what's seen, heard, & sensed,
    habits & practices
        —all—
who've abandoned their manifold ways
        —again, all—
who, comprehending craving,
    are effluent-free:
I, too, say they've crossed over the flood.

vv. 1077–1083

Note

1. For a discussion of the abandoning of habits and practices, see The Mind Like Fire Unbound, chapters 3 and 4, and The Paradox of Becoming, chapter 4.

5:8 Hemaka's Question

In the past,
before hearing Gotama's message,
when anyone explained 'It is,' 'It will be,'
all that was hearsay,
        quotation marks.
All that promoted conjecture
and gave me no pleasure.
Now, sage, teach me the Dhamma demolishing craving,
knowing which, living mindfully,
one would cross over beyond
entanglement in the world.

The Buddha:

Here, Hemaka,
with regard to things dear
    —seen, heard, sensed, & cognized—
there is:
        the dispelling of passion & desire,
        the unfallen, undying[1] state of unbinding.

Those knowing this, mindful,
    fully unbound
    in the here-&-now,
are always[2] calmed,
have crossed over beyond
entanglement in the world.

vv. 1084–1087

Notes

1. "Unfallen, undying": two meanings of the word, accuta.

2. Reading sadā with the Burmese, Sri Lankan, and PTS editions. The Thai edition read satā, mindful, but this is a repetition of satā in the previous line, something that Pali poetry tends to avoid except for purposes of emphasis.

5:9 Todeyya's Questions

One in whom
no sensualities dwell;
in whom
no craving is found;
who has crossed over perplexity—
    his emancipation:
    What is it like?

The Buddha:

One in whom
no sensualities dwell;
in whom
no craving is found;
who has crossed over perplexity—
    his emancipation
    is not other than that.[1]

Todeyya:

Is he without desire,
or desiring?
Discerning or still acquiring discernment?
Describe the sage to me, Sakyan,
All-around Eye,
so that I may recognize what he is like.

The Buddha:

He's without desire,
    not desiring;
discerning,
not still acquiring discernment.

Recognize the sage, Todeyya, as having nothing,
unentangled
    in sensuality & becoming.

vv. 1088–1091

Note

1. Nd IIA: The ending of craving is, in and of itself, emancipation. See SN 43.

5:10 Kappa's Question

For one stranded in the middle of the lake,
in the flood of great danger—birth—
overwhelmed with aging & death:
  Tell me the island, dear sir, and show me the island
  so that this may not happen again.

The Buddha:

For one stranded in the middle of the lake,
in the flood of great danger—birth—
overwhelmed with aging & death,
  Kappa, I will tell you the island.[1]

Having nothing, free
of clinging:
  That is the island,
  there is no other.
That's unbinding, I tell you,
the total ending of aging & death.

Those knowing this, mindful,
    fully unbound
    in the here-&-now,
  don't serve as Māra's servants, don't come under Māra's sway.[2]

vv. 1092–1095

Notes

1. On the Dhamma as an island, see DN 16.
2. On Māra's sway, see SN 4:19, SN 35:115, SN 35:189, and SN 35:199.

5:11 Jatukaṇṇin's Question

Hearing, hero,
of one with no desire for sensuality, I've come to ask
the one gone beyond the flood, sensuality-free:
Tell me the state of peace,
Blessed One, Simultaneous Eye.[1]
Tell me
as it actually is.
For the Blessed One lives having conquered sensuality, as the radiant sun, in its radiance, the earth.
Limited my discernment, O Deeply Discerning.
Teach me to know the Dhamma, the abandoning here
of birth
& aging.

The Buddha:

Subdue greed for sensuality, & see renunciation as rest.
Let there be nothing grasped or rejected by you.
Burn up what's before,
and have nothing for after.
If you don't grasp
at what's in between,[2]
you will go about, calm.

One completely devoid of greed for name-&-form, brahman, has no effluents

    by which he would go
    under Māra's sway.

vv. 1096–1100

Notes

1. According to Nd II, the Buddha is called the Simultaneous Eye because the Eye of his omniscience arose simultaneously with his awakening to Buddhahood. It's hardly likely, though, that Jatukaṇṇin would have this idea in mind when speaking to the Buddha for the first time. More likely, he might be alluding to the idea that the Buddha is able to see things, and to understand them for what they are, the moment they arise.

2. According to Nd II, 'before' stands for defilements related to the past, 'after' for defilements related to the future, and 'in between' for the five aggregates—form, feeling, perception, thought-fabrications, sensory consciousness—in the present.

5:12 Bhadrāvudha's Question

I entreat the one who has abandoned home—cutting through craving, unperturbed; abandoned delight—crossed over the flood, released;
abandoned theory—very intelligent:
Having heard the Nāga, they will leave—the many gathered from many lands, hero, in hopes of your words.
So tell them, please,
    how this Dhamma has been known to you.

The Buddha:

Subdue craving & grasping—all—
    above, below,
    across, in between.[1]
For whatever people cling to in the world, it's through that that Māra pursues them.

So a monk, mindful,
    seeing these people entangled in grasping as entangled in Death's realm, should cling to nothing in all the world,
        every world.

vv. 1101–1104

NOTE

1. For Nd II's discussion of the various meanings of the objects of craving "above, below, across, in between," see Sn 5:4, note 3. For further discussions of the many places where craving can arise, see DN 22 and SN 35:95, note 1.

5:13 Udaya's Questions

To the one in jhāna—seated, dustless,
passionless,
his task done,
effluent-free,
gone to the beyond
of all phenomena—
I've come with a desire for a question.
Tell me the gnosis of emancipation,
the breaking open
of ignorance.

The Buddha:

The abandoning
both of sensual desires, & of unhappiness,
the dispelling of sloth,
the warding off of anxieties, equanimity-&-mindfulness purified, with inspection of mental qualities swift in the forefront:
That I call the gnosis of emancipation,[1]
the breaking open
of ignorance.[2]

Udaya:

With what is the world fettered?
With what is it examined?
Through the abandoning of what is there said to be

unbinding?

The Buddha:

With delight
the world's fettered.
With directed thought
it's examined.
Through the abandoning of craving is there said to be
unbinding.

Udaya:

Living mindful in what way does one bring consciousness
to a halt?
We've come to ask
the Blessed One.
Let us hear your words.

The Buddha:

Not relishing feeling,
inside or out:
One living mindful in this way brings consciousness
to a halt.[3]

vv. 1105–1111

Notes

1. The state of mind described here corresponds to the five-factored noble right concentration described in AN 5:28, and analyzed more fully in AN 9:36. For further discussion, see section III/F in The Wings to Awakening and the essays, "Jhāna Not by the Numbers" and "Silence Isn't Mandatory."

2. AN 3:33 contains a discussion of this verse. The Buddha tells Ven. Sāriputta that one should train oneself such that "with regard to this conscious body, there will be no 'I'-making or 'mine'-making or obsession with conceit, such that with regard to all external themes [topics of concentration] there will be no 'I'-making or 'mine'-making or obsession with conceit, and that we will enter & remain in the awareness-release & discernment-release in which there is no 'I'-making or 'mine'-making or obsession with conceit." When one has trained in this way, he says, one is called a person who has cut through craving, unraveled the fetter, who has, through the right penetration of conceit, put an end to suffering and stress. He then states that it was in connection to this state that he uttered this verse.

3. See DN 11, DN 15, MN 49, and SN 12:67. For a discussion of "bringing consciousness to a halt"—showing that it is not an annihilation of consciousness, but rather the ending of its proliferating activity—see SN 22:53. See also the image in SN 12:64.

5:14 Posāla's Question

To one who reveals the past
—unperturbed,
his doubts cut through—
who has gone to the beyond
of all phenomena,
I've come with a desire for a question.
I ask the Sakyan about the knowledge[1]
of one devoid of perception of forms, who has abandoned all the body, every body,
who sees, within & without,
'There is nothing':
How is he
to be led further on?

The Buddha:

The Tathāgata, knowing directly all stations of consciousness,[2] knows for one stationed in them release
& the steps leading there.

Knowing directly
the origin of nothingness to be the fetter of delight, one then sees there
clearly.
That's his genuine knowledge—the brahman who has lived to fulfillment.

vv. 1112–1115

Notes

1. Posāla's question concerning the knowledge of the person in the dimension of nothingness has a double meaning: He is asking about the Buddha's knowledge about that person, and also what a person in that dimension of attainment should do to develop his/her knowledge even further. The Buddha's answer deals with the question in both its senses. On delight in nothingness, see MN 106.

2. On the seven stations of consciousness, see DN 15. The dimension of nothingness, discussed in this dialogue, is the seventh and most refined. See Sn 5:6, note 1. On the steps leading to release from being stationed in the formless states, see MN 52, MN 102, MN 106, MN 111, MN 140, and AN 9:36.

5:15 Mogharāja's Question

Twice now, Sakyan, I've asked you,
but you, One with Eyes, haven't answered me.
"When asked the third time,
the divine seer answers":
    So I have heard.
This world, the next world,
the Brahmā world with its devas:
    I don't know how they're viewed by the prestigious Gotama.
So to the one who has seen to the far extreme,
I've come with a desire for a question:
    One who regards the world in what way isn't seen by Death's King?

The Buddha:

Always mindful, Mogharāja,[1] regard the world as empty,
having removed any view
    in terms of self.
This way
one is above & beyond death.
One who regards the world
    in this way
isn't seen by Death's King.

vv. 1116–1119

NOTE

1. Cited by the Buddha at AN 1:149 (1:234) as foremost among the monks in wearing coarse robes.

5:16 Piṅgiya's Questions

I'm old & weak,
my complexion dull,
I've blurry eyes
and trouble hearing—but may I not perish
while still deluded,
confused!
Teach me the Dhamma
so that I may know
the abandoning here
of birth & aging.

The Buddha:

Seeing people suffering on account of their bodies—heedless people are afflicted
on account of their bodies—
then heedful, Piṅgiya,
let go of the body
for the sake of no further becoming.

Piṅgiya:

In the four cardinal directions,
the four intermediate,
above & below
—these ten directions—
there is nothing in the world unseen, unheard,
unsensed, uncognized by you.
Teach me the Dhamma
so that I may know
the abandoning here

of birth & aging.

The Buddha:

Seeing people,
victims of craving—
inflamed, overwhelmed with aging—
then heedful, Piṅgiya,
let go of craving
for the sake of no further becoming.

vv. 1120–1123

V : The To-the-Far-Shore Chapter (Pārāyana Vagga)

Epilogue

That is what the Blessed One said when dwelling among the Magadhans at the Pāsāṇaka shrine. Asked in turn by the sixteen brahmans, he answered their questions. And if one were to practice the Dhamma in accordance with the Dhamma,[1] knowing the meaning and Dhamma of each of these questions, one would go to the far shore of birth & death. Because these Dhammas lead there, this Dhamma-sequence is called "To the Far Shore."

Ajita, Tissa-metteyya,
Puṇṇaka & Mettagū,
Dhotaka & Upasīva,
Nanda & Hemaka,
Todeyya & Kappa,
the wise Jatukaṇṇin,
Bhadrāvudha & Udaya,
Posāla the brahman,
Mogharāja the intelligent,
and Piṅgiya the great seer:
They went to the Awakened One, consummate in conduct, the seer.
They went to the excellent Awakened One, asking subtle questions.
The Awakened One,
when asked their questions, answered in line with the truth.

By answering their questions, the sage delighted the brahmans.
They, delighted by the One with Eyes—Awakened, Kinsman of the Sun—lived the holy life
in the presence of the one
of foremost discernment.

Whoever would practice as the Awakened One taught concerning each of these questions, would go from the near shore to the far—
would go from the near shore to the far developing the path supreme.
The path is for going beyond, and so it's called "To the Far Shore."

Ven. Piṅgiya:[2]

"I will recite 'To the Far Shore.'
As he saw, so he taught—stainless, of deep intelligence, the Nāga with no sensuality,
    no forest[3]:
For what reason would he tell a lie?
His delusion & stains left behind; left behind, his hypocrisy, conceit:
    Let me praise his beautiful words.
He who is truly described as dispeller of darkness,
awakened,
All-around Eye,
gone to the end of the cosmos,[4]
    all his becoming transcended,
effluent-free,
    his stress all abandoned:

He is served by me.

As a bird leaving a scrubby grove would dwell in a forest abundant in fruit, even so, I have left those of next-to-no vision, have arrived
like a swan at a large lake.

In the past,
before hearing Gotama's message,
when anyone explained 'It is,' 'It will be,'
all that was hearsay,
        quotation marks.
All that promoted conjecture
and gave me no pleasure.[5]

Sitting alone—
the dispeller of darkness, shining, bringer of light,
    Gotama of deep knowledge,
    Gotama of deep intelligence:
He taught me the Dhamma
timeless, visible here-&-now,
the ending of craving,
    calamity-free,
whose likeness is nowhere at all."

Bāvarī:

"Piṅgiya, for even a moment can you stay apart from him—Gotama of deep knowledge,
    Gotama of deep intelligence,
who taught you the Dhamma
timeless, visible here-&-now,
the ending of craving,
    calamity-free,
whose likeness is nowhere at all?"

Ven. Piṅgiya:

"No, brahman, not even for a moment can I stay apart from him—Gotama of deep knowledge,

    Gotama of deep intelligence,
who taught me the Dhamma
timeless, visible here-&-now,
the ending of craving,
    calamity-free,
whose likeness is nowhere at all.

I see him with my heart as if with my eye—
heedful, brahman, by day & by night.
I spend the night paying homage to him,
and that way, as it were,
    not staying apart.
My conviction, rapture, mindfulness, & heart,
don't stray from Gotama's message.

To whatever direction he goes,
the one deeply discerning,
to that direction I bow down.
I am old, my stamina frail, which is why my body doesn't run away to there.
But through the machine of my resolves
    I constantly go,
for my heart, brahman, is connected to him.

Floundering in the mud,
I swam from island to island,
but then I saw the One Self-Awakened, crossed over the flood, effluent-free.

    'As Vakkali has shown his conviction[6]— as Bhadrāvudha & Āḷavi Gotama too—so will you show your conviction, Piṅgiya.
    You will go beyond the realm of death.'

I feel confidence all the more, having heard the words of the sage,

his roof opened-up, self-awakened, quick-witted, free from rigidity.
Knowing the supreme devas,[7]
he knows all dhammas, from high to low:
the Teacher who puts an end to the questions of those admitting their doubt.

To the untaken-in, unshaken,[8]
whose likeness is nowhere at all:
Yes, I will go there.
I've no doubt about that.
Remember me thus as one whose mind
is decided.

vv. 1124–1149

Notes

1. See SN 22:39–42.

2. According to SnA, the sixteen brahmans, after their questions were answered, requested and received the Going-forth and Acceptance. After that, Piṅgiya, now Ven. Piṅgiya, received permission from the Buddha to return to Bāvarī to report the results of their trip.

3. Reading nikkāmo nibbano nāgo with the Sri Lankan and Burmese versions, a reading confirmed by Nd II. The Thai version has nibbuto, "unbound," instead of nibbano. The PTS version has nātho, "protector," instead of nāgo.

According to Nd II, "no forest" here means free from the forests of passion, aversion, delusion, resentment, and all other unskillful mental fabrications. See Dhp 283.

4. See SN 35:82, SN 35:116, and AN 4:45.

5. The phrase, "and gave me no pleasure," appears in the Thai edition but not the others.

6. According to Nd IIA, to show conviction means to attain arahantship through the strength of conviction. The expression also occurs in SN 6:1, where it seems to have a more general meaning. Ven. Vakkali's story appears in SN 22:87. At AN 1:147 (1:208) the Buddha cites him as foremost among the monks in being decisive in his conviction. Bhadrāvudha is apparently the same Bhadrāvudha in Sn 5:12. Āḷavi Gotama is mentioned nowhere else in the Canon.

7. In AN 8:71 (AN 8:64 in the PTS reckoning), the Buddha states that he did not claim full awakening until his knowledge of the deva world was complete.

8. See MN 131.

Theragāthā & Therīgāthā

Poems of the Elders

An Anthology from the Theragāthā & Therīgāthā
With an Introduction & Notes

Introduction to the Theragāthā & Therīgāthā

This is an anthology consisting of 97 poems from the Theragāthā (Poems of the Elder Monks) and 34 from the Therīgāthā (Poems of the Elder Nuns). These texts are, respectively, the eighth and ninth texts in the Khuddaka Nikāya, or Collection of Short Pieces, the last collection of the Sutta Piṭaka in the Pāli Canon.

The Theragāthā contains a total of 264 poems, the Therīgāthā, 73, all attributed to early members of the monastic Saṅgha. Some of the poems are attributed to monks or nuns well-known from other parts of the Canon—such as Ānanda and Mahā Kassapa among the monks, and Mahāpajāpatī Gotamī and Uppalavaṇṇā among the nuns—whereas the majority are attributed to monks and nuns otherwise unknown.

Both texts are landmarks in the history of world literature. The Therīgāthā is the earliest extant text depicting women's spiritual experiences. The Theragāthā contains the earliest extant descriptions extolling the beauties, not of domesticated nature, but of nature where it's wild.

The poems in both compilations are arranged by ascending size, starting with chapters in which every poem consists of only one stanza, and working up numerically, chapter by chapter, to poems of many stanzas. The longest poem in the Theragāthā is 71 stanzas; the longest in the Therīgāthā, 75. Unlike the Dhammapada and Udāna, there is no overall aesthetic structure to either collection, although within a few of the chapters, such as the first chapter of the Theragāthā and the seventh of the Therīgāthā, poems of similar themes are grouped together.

Because the poems are attributed to a wide variety of authors, it should come as no surprise that they differ widely in style, content, and artistic interest: Thus my choice to present an anthology of selected poems rather than a complete translation of either text. Some of the poems are autobiographical; some didactic. Some repeat verses attributed to the Buddha in other parts of the Canon, whereas others appear to be original compositions. Some are very simple and just barely poetic, whereas others are polished and artful, composed by people who obviously had a sophisticated literary background.

The polished poems are among the most interesting, and to fully appreciate them it's necessary to know something of the aesthetic theory that shaped their composition.

Ancient Indian Aesthetics

The central concept in ancient Indian aesthetic theory was that every artistic text should have rasa, or "savor," and the theory around savor was this: Artistic literature expressed states of emotion or states of mind called bhāva. The classic analysis of basic emotions listed eight: love (delight), humor, grief, anger, energy, fear, disgust, and astonishment. The reader or listener exposed to these presentations of emotion did not participate in them directly; rather, he/she savored them as an aesthetic experience at one remove from the emotion, and the savor—though related to the emotion—was somewhat different from it. The proof of this point was that some of the basic emotions were decidedly unpleasant, whereas the savor of the emotion was meant to be enjoyed.

Each of the emotions had its corresponding savor, as follows:

love — sensitive
humor — comic
grief — compassionate
anger — furious
energy — heroic
fear — apprehensive
disgust — horrific
astonishment — marvelous

Thus, for instance, a heroic character would feel energy, rather than heroism, but the reader would taste that energy as heroic. Characters in love would feel their love, but the reader/listener, in empathizing with their love, would taste that empathy as an experience of being sensitive.

An ideal work of literary art was supposed to convey one dominant savor, but if it was long enough, it was expected, like a good meal, to offer

many subsidiary savors as well. Some savors were believed to supplement one another naturally. The sensitive, for instance, was believed to blend well with the comic and the compassionate. The heroic often started with the apprehensive or furious, and tended to end with a touch of the marvelous. Other savors, however, worked at cross-purposes. The horrific, in particular, did not blend with the sensitive or the comic.

All eight of the classic savors can be found in the poems of the Theragāthā (Thag) and Therīgāthā (Thig). Thig 14, for instance, begins with long passages conveying the sensitive savor, and ends with a jolt conveying an unusual and rule-breaking combination of the comic, horrific, heroic, and marvelous. Thag 16:1 is a more classic example of the heroic and marvelous, whereas Thag 1:104 conveys the marvelous on its own, and Thag 2:24, 2:37, and 3:8 convey the purely heroic. Thag 2:16 and 10:5 offer a savor of the horrific; Thig 3:5 and 6:2, the compassionate. Thag 5:8 and 6:2 begin with the apprehensive before moving on to the heroic, and Thag 2:47 conveys the furious by depicting a monk angry at his own mind.

Unlike plays, however, which can convey savor through language, costumes, and the gestures of the actors, these poems, like all poems, convey savor solely through their use of language. Classical treatises devoted a great deal of space to discussions of how language could be used to convey different savors. And, while many of their recommendations had to do with the sound of the language—and are thus hard to convey when translating—some do survive translation.

This is particularly true of two types of ornamentation: similes and a type of figure called a "lamp." Lamps are a peculiarity of poetry in Indian languages, which are heavily inflected, a fact that allows a poet to use, say, one adjective to modify two different nouns, or one verb to function in two separate sentences. (The name of the figure derives from the idea that the two nouns radiate from the one adjective, or the two sentences from the one verb.) In English, the closest we have to this is parallelism combined with ellipsis. An example from the Theragāthā is 1:2—

> Calmed, restrained,
> giving counsel unruffled,
> he shakes off evil qualities—

as the breeze,
a leaf from a tree.

—where "shakes off" functions as the verb in both clauses, even though it is elided from the second. This is how I have rendered the lamps in most of the poems, although in a few cases, such as Thag 1:111, I have repeated the lamp word to emphasize its double role.

Glancing through this anthology, you will quickly see that many of the poems succeed in conveying savor precisely because of their heavy use of similes and lamps. The lamps, through their concision, give a heightened flavor to the language without making it flowery. The similes flesh out with graphic images messages that without them would be abstract and dry.

Other rhetorical features traditionally used to convey savor can also be found in the Theragāthā and Therīgāthā, such as: admonitions (upadiṣṭa) [Thag 2:37, Thag 3:13, Thig 6:7], distinctions (viśeṣaṇa) [Thag 5:10, Thag 12:1, Thag 14:2], encouragement (protsāhana) [Thag 2:37, Thag 5:8, Thag 6:2], examples (dṛṣtānta) [Thig 3:4], explanations of cause and effect (hetu) [Thag 4:10], illustrations (udāharaṇa) [Thag 2:24], rhetorical questions (pṛcchā) [Thag 1:56, Thag 1:109, Thag 5:8, Thig 3:5], prohibitions (pratiṣedha) [Thag 2:47; Thig 9], and praise (guṇakīrtana) [Thag 15:2, Thig 6:6].

In all these formal respects, the poems in the Theragāthā and Therīgāthā do not differ markedly from those attributed to the Buddha in the Dhammapada, Udāna, and Itivuttaka. And although some of the poems in the Theragāthā and Therīgāthā, such as Thag 1:100, seem fairly formulaic in their attempts at inducing savor, others—in terms of Indian aesthetic theory—break new ground.

One way in which they do this relates to the emotions some of the poems portray. As Indian aesthetic theory developed through the centuries, various writers argued for and against the addition of other savors to the standard list of eight. One of the prime candidates for a ninth savor was the calmed, the savor tasted when witnessing another person achieve peace. There are good reasons to believe that the first proponents of the calmed as a legitimate savor for literary works were Buddhist. For example, the great Buddhist poet, Aśvaghoṣa, who wrote epics and plays in the 1st century C.E., insisted that he was trying to lead his audience not to pleasure, but to calm. In this, he was echoing a sentiment expressed much earlier, in the Dhammapada, concerning the effect that Dhamma should have on its listeners:

> Like a deep lake,
> clear, unruffled, & calm:
> so the wise become clear,
> calm,
> on hearing words of the Dhamma. — Dhp 82

> And better than chanting hundreds
> of meaningless verses is
> one > Dhamma-saying
> that on hearing
> brings peace. — Dhp 102

Both the Theragāthā and Therīgāthā contain many poems that achieve this effect of calm and peace by describing how the speaker attained the peace of awakening. A typical example is from Vimalā's poem, Thig 5:2:

> Today, wrapped in a double cloak,
> my head shaven,
> having wandered for alms,
> I sit at the foot of a tree
> and attain the state of no-thought.
> All ties—human & divine—have been cut.
> Having cast off all
> effluents,
> cooled am I. Unbound.

Reading these lines, the reader savors some of Vimalā's coolness and peace. Other poems in both compilations convey the same savor through other means. A prime example is Ambapālī's poem, Thig 13:1, in which she graphically catalogs, part by part, how age has changed her body. After each part, however, she repeats the refrain: "The Truth-speaker's word doesn't change." This refrain, which itself doesn't change, has a calming effect, so that the reader tastes some of Ambapālī's peace of mind as she views, from the bemused perspective of the timeless Dhamma, the changes wrought in her body by the ravages of time.

These examples suggest that the poems of the Theragāthā and Therīgāthā may have been among the first conscious attempts to convey the calmed as a new savor, thus setting the stage for the further development of this savor in later centuries of Buddhist and even non-Buddhist poetry in India.

Another way in which the poems of the Theragāthā and Therīgāthā broke new ground can be seen in how they subvert some of the traditions of ancient Indian aesthetic theory.

A prime example is the rule-breaking poem mentioned above, Thig 14. Its story tells of a nun, Subhā, who is accosted by a libertine as she is going through a secluded patch of woods. He tries to persuade her to abandon her vows and become his wife. She, in turn, tries to show him the foolishness of his lust for her body. When asked what in her body he finds attractive, he focuses on the beauty of her eyes. So, after some further admonitions about the unattractive aspects of eyes, she plucks out one of her eyes and offers it to him. This, of course, makes very explicit the message that what he thought he desired is nothing worthy of desire. The libertine, shocked into his senses, asks for her forgiveness and allows her to go on her way. She returns to the Buddha, and when she gazes at him, her eye is restored.

From an aesthetic point of view, two features of the poem are especially striking. First, the libertine is given some of the most beautiful lines in Pāli poetry. But this is a setup. The lines are obviously intended to create a savor of the sensitive, but this savor will then be drastically undercut by the horrific savor induced when Subhā plucks out her eye. The libertine's skill with words is thus exposed as the skill of a fool. In this way, the poem conveys the message that when people deny the allure of sensuality, it's not necessarily because they are too dull to have developed refined tastes. They, too, are able to appreciate the beauties of language well enough to compose alluring lines. So their rejection of sensuality is not a sign of lack of sophistication. Instead, it's a sign that they have gone beyond sophistication to something higher.

The second striking feature is the combination of the comic and the horrific at the conclusion to the poem. Subhā's act of removing her eye is obviously disgusting, yet at the same time it's hard not to imagine her laughing at her own bravado in carrying it out. "You want it?" she seems to say, "all right, you can have it." This combination of the comic and the horrific broke one of the classic rules of Indian aesthetic theory, a fact that underscores the complete freedom with which Subhā is acting. Not only is she so free of attachment to sensuality that she can play a trick like this on the libertine, she is also free enough to break long-established literary conventions.

Another poem that breaks with ancient Indian aesthetic theory is Thag 14:1. This poem depicts Ven. Revata's last words before entering total unbinding, and in so doing it breaks with an ancient Indian taboo against presenting a character's death. The standard procedure in plays, when dealing with a death, was to report it as happening off-stage. The dying character was never presented saying his last words. The reason that the compilers of the Theragāthā felt free to break with this tradition may be related to the fact that the ability to attain arahantship gave a new meaning to death. Instead of being an occasion for fear or grief, an arahant's death was peaceful. A poem presenting an arahant's last words would thus convey, not apprehension or compassion, but a savor of calm.

The poems of the Theragāthā and Therīgāthā break new ground not only in terms of their aesthetic form but also in terms of their subject matter. As noted above, the Therīgāthā is the earliest extant text to convey accounts of women's spiritual experiences, ostensibly in their own words. This in itself is quite countercultural, but doubly countercultural are the poems in which women report the sense of freedom that comes from contemplating the unattractiveness of the body (see, for instance, Thig 2:4, 5:4, and 14) to counteract pride and lust. Because ancient Indian culture, like so many human cultures, taught women to identify strongly with their bodies and to judge themselves by how attractive their bodies appeared, these poems make an important point: The best way not to suffer over the issue of your body's appearance is not to work at cultivating a continually positive image of that appearance. It's to develop dispassion toward the issue of appearance entirely, and to find a happiness not based on things inconstant and subject to change. At the same time, because the contemplation of unattractiveness is regarded as a painful practice (AN 4:163), the accounts of women who have succeeded at this practice convey a savor of the heroic.

As for the Theragāthā, it breaks new ground in terms of subject matter with its poems extolling the beauties of the wilderness. Ancient Indian culture, like all pre-modern cultures that had developed past the hunter-gatherer stage, tended to view the wilderness with suspicion and fear. But the Buddhist monks had essentially returned to an economy very similar to that of hunter-gatherers—hunting, in the words of Thig 13:2, only what is already cooked. Thus they had learned, like earlier hunter-gatherers, to view the wilderness as home, an ideal place to hunt for the deathless. Thus there is good reason for the many poems in the Theragāthā dealing with the beauty of the wilderness—Thag 18 is the primary example, but 1:13, 1:22, 1:41, 1:110, 1:113, 10:2, and 11 fall into this category as well. The point of these poems is not that beauty of this sort is an end in itself, but that the wilderness provides an ideal place to refresh the mind in its quest for a higher happiness.

Now, it's true that other poems in the Theragāthā, such as Thag 1:31, 3:5, 3:8, and 5:8, detail the hardships of living in the wilderness, but these poems are not meant to discourage their readers from taking up the wilderness life. On the contrary, they appeal to the reader's desire to take up a life with a heroic dimension. In this way, the Theragāthā makes the wilderness life of a monk attractive both aesthetically and energetically. Thus these poems are good inducements for seeking seclusion and trying to gain the benefits of practicing there.

And in these ways, by breaking new ground in terms of subject matter, both the Theragāthā and Therīgāthā at the same time provide new standards of heroism for ancient Indian culture—and for world culture at large.

Authorship & Authenticity

Just who composed these poems, and put so much art into them, is a matter of conjecture. There is also no way of knowing who compiled them in their present form or when. There are several reasons to believe that many parts of both the Theragāthā and Therīgāthā were composed quite late, at least two centuries after the Buddha's passing away. Thag 10:2, for instance, is attributed to King Asoka's younger brother, who postdated the Buddha by a century or two. Also, both the Theragāthā and Therīgāthā are placed in the Khuddaka after two other compositions generally regarded as late—the Vimānavatthu and Petavatthu—which suggests that they too, even though they may contain earlier material, were compiled at a relatively late date.

Some scholars have proposed that the Theragāthā and Therīgāthā were compiled as part of the movement to provide early Buddhism with dramatic stage pieces as a way of making the teaching attractive to the masses: a trend that culminated in later centuries in a thriving Buddhist theatre as Buddhism became an established, wealthy religion. In formal terms, many of the poems in the Theragāthā and Therīgāthā would seem to bear this theory out. Thag 10:2, 11, and 14:1, for instance, read like dramatic monologues; Thag 16:1, Thig 9, Thig 12, and Thig 13:2, like dramatic dialogues. Three poems—Thig 7:2, 7:3, and 8—have parallels in another part of the Canon (SN 5), and one of the ways they differ from those parallels is that each is introduced with a stanza that would serve well as a dramatic introduction on stage.

Another dramatic element in both the Theragāthā and Therīgāthā that differs from the earlier suttas is that in many of the autobiographical poems, the speaker proclaims his/her awakening in these terms: "Cooled am I"—or "calmed am I"— "unbound." (See, for instance, Thag 4:10 and Thig 5:2.) These statements would make a dramatic impact if presented on stage. But, in the context of the early teachings, such an announcement, with its reference to "I," was proof that the speaker was not really awakened. See for instance, the Buddha's statement at MN 102, referring to a person announcing, "I am at peace, I am unbound, I am without clinging": "The fact that he envisions that 'I am at peace, I am unbound, I am without clinging!'—that in itself points to his clinging." Or this statement in AN 6:49 about the proper way to proclaim gnosis, or the knowledge of full awakening: "Monks, this is how clansmen declare gnosis. The meaning is stated, but without mention of self." This is one way in which the dramatic form of the poems distorts an important point in the training of the mind.

The predominance of drama over Dhamma in the Theragāthā and Therīgāthā can also be seen in the way some of their poems treat an issue central to both compilations: attachment to the body. Many poems—such as Thig 5:4, Thag 5:1, and Thag 7:1—relate how the speakers gained full awakening on abandoning precisely this attachment, but the description of the process in each case leaves out many details that other texts show are crucial. To begin with, in the poems of this category in the Theragāthā, full awakening comes with overcoming attachment to the body of the opposite sex. Only in the Therīgāthā poems does awakening come with overcoming attachment to one's own body. In this respect, the Therīgāthā is closer than the Theragāthā to the sutta accounts of what is required for overcoming this attachment, because, as AN 7:48 points out, attraction to the opposite sex begins with attraction to one's own body. So in this way, the Theragāthā poems leave out an important step when describing how attachment is overcome.

However, poems of this category in both compilations leave out an even more important step in describing how the abandoning of attachment leads to awakening. In each case, these poems describe the awakening that comes with abandoning passion for the body as total. But suttas detailing the fetters abandoned with the four stages of awakening, such as AN 10:13 and MN 118, indicate that simply overcoming sensual passion is a mark, not of the fourth state, total awakening, but only of the third stage, non-return. Some of the poems in the Theragāthā dealing with this topic, such as Thag 10:5, do indicate that total awakening requires more than abandoning attachment to the body, but Thig 5:4, Thag 5:1, and Thag 7:1, if read on their own, could create the impression that nothing more is needed.

Now, if these poems were intended for dramatic presentation, it's easy to understand why they give such a compressed account of how awakening is achieved: More detailed accounts would deprive the poems of their dramatic effect. But the effect has its price, in giving a distorted sense of the practice.

For these reasons, it is possible that the existence of the Theragāthā and Therīgāthā is related to a complaint, voiced in some of the other suttas, that with the passage of time people will become less interested in the Buddha's teachings and instead will pay more attention to "literary works

—the works of poets, artful in sound, artful in rhetoric… words of disciples" (AN 5:79). Many of the poems in the Theragāthā and Therīgāthā fit this latter description precisely.

All of this means that for a person interested in the practice of the Dhamma, the Theragāthā and Therīgāthā should be read with caution and care. The stories told in their poems, and the people they portray, are inspiring and attractive, but their example may not be the best to follow in every respect, and the Dhamma they teach has to be checked against more reliable sources.

These poems do mention many of the standard doctrines of early Buddhism, such as the triple refuge (Thig 13:2), kamma (Thig 12), the four noble truths (Thig 7:3), the eightfold path (Thig 6:6), the establishings of mindfulness (Thag 1:100), the ten fetters (Thig 6:7), the five hindrances (Thag 2:26), the five aggregates (Thag 1:23), the practice of goodwill, or mettā (Thig 14), and the practice of jhāna, or meditative absorption (Thag 1:41, 1:43, 1:85, 1:119). They also employ the concepts of effluent (āsava) and kamma in their strictly Buddhist sense (see Thag 1:100, note 1, and Thag 16:8, note 4), and Thag 3:14 provides a quick tour of the Buddhist cosmos. However, none of these doctrines are discussed in any detail. For discussions detailed enough to be of practical help, you have to look elsewhere in the Canon.

Like the Udāna, the Theragāthā and Therīgāthā seem concerned less with explaining specific Dhamma teachings and more with portraying early Buddhist values. In particular, the values listed in two suttas from the Aṅguttara Nikaya—AN 7:80 and AN 8:53—are well-represented in the poems of both collections.

Here, for example, are some poems illustrating the values listed in AN 8:53:

dispassion — Thag 1:39; Thig 5:4; Thig 13:5
being unfettered — Thig 1:11; Thig 2:3; Thig 6:7 shedding — Thag 6:9; Thig 5:2
modesty — Thag 6:10
contentment — Thag 16:7; Thag 18
reclusiveness — Thag 3:8; Thag 18 aroused persistence — Thag 2:24; Thag 3:5

being unburdensome — Thig 13:2

And here are some poems illustrating the values listed in AN 7:80:

disenchantment — Thag 5:1; Thag 6:6; Thag 7:1; Thag 10:5
dispassion — Thag 1:18; Thag 2:30 cessation — Thig 6:6; Thag 3:15 stilling — Thig 7:2
direct knowledge — Thag 3:14; Thig 7:3; Thig 9 self-awakening — Thag 12:2; Thag 14:2
unbinding — Thag 1:32; Thag 14:1; Thig 5:10

Fortunately, given the uncertain provenance of the poems in the Theragāthā and Therīgāthā, only a few attempt to discuss high-level Dhamma in any detail. Thag 15:2 is one of the exceptions, as it contains a rare image to illustrate why the arahant, prior to death, is said to experience unbinding "with fuel remaining," and why, by extension, the experience of unbinding after death is said to have "no fuel remaining." However, the same poem appears in AN 6:43, indicating the Theragāthā here is not deviating from a more reliable source.

There is also only one teaching appearing in these texts that doesn't appear elsewhere in the early suttas: Thag 16:7 contains the only complete list of all thirteen ascetic (dhutaṅga) practices to be found anywhere in the Canon. But this is not a point of high-level theory, and more a matter of everyday practice that the reader can easily test for him or herself.

So these texts seem meant to be read, not for detailed information about the path of practice, but for the savor with which they make the practice attractive and the encouragement they give for taking up the practice yourself.

Recollection of the Saṅgha

The best way to use these poems is to read them as aids in the meditative exercise called recollection of the Saṅgha (saṅghānussati). And they aid in this exercise in two ways.

The first way relates to the fact that, elsewhere in the Canon, the description of this practice is fairly abstract and dry:

> "There is the case where the disciple of the noble ones recollects the Saṅgha, thus: 'The Saṅgha of the Blessed One's disciples who have practiced well… who have practiced straight-forwardly… who have practiced methodically… who have practiced masterfully—in other words, the four types (of noble disciples) when taken as pairs, the eight when taken as individual types—they are the Saṅgha of the Blessed One's disciples: deserving of gifts, deserving of hospitality, deserving of offerings, deserving of respect, the incomparable field of merit for the world.'" — AN 3:71

The narratives in both the Theragāthā and Therīgāthā add flesh and blood to this contemplation, giving graphic examples of what it means to practice well and why those who practice well are worthy of respect. This point applies both to the cases where the narratives tell of monks and nuns who face danger with nobility and calm already firmly in place (such as Thag 16:1 and Thig 14), and in those where the monks and nuns have to overcome great weakness, misfortune, or discouragement to achieve final awakening (such as Thag 6:6 and Thig 10).

These latter examples, in particular, aid in a strategy that Ven. Ānanda called relying on conceit to abandon conceit:

> "There is the case, sister, where a monk hears, 'The monk named such-and-such, they say, through the ending of the effluents, has entered & remains in the effluent-free awareness-release & discernment-release, having directly known & realized them for himself right in the here & now.' The thought occurs to him, 'The monk named such-&-such, they say, through the ending of the effluents, has entered & remains in the effluent-free awareness-release & discernment-release, having directly known & realized them for himself right in the here & now. Then why not me?' Then, at a later time, he abandons conceit, having relied on conceit." — AN 4:159

Seeing the difficulties that others have overcome before reaching awakening makes it easier to imagine that you, too, can overcome your personal difficulties and reach awakening as well. If they can do it, why not you?

The second way in which the poems of the Theragāthā and Therīgāthā aid in the practice of recollecting the Saṅgha comes in their own examples of monks and nuns who engage in this practice themselves, showing the purposes for which it's useful.

Elsewhere in the suttas, the recollection of the Saṅgha is said to serve three purposes: AN 3:71 says that it cleanses the mind, gives rise to joy, and helps one to abandon defilements. SN 11:3 says that it helps to overcome fear when one is practicing alone in an empty dwelling or in the wilderness. SN 47:10 points out that if one has trouble staying with any of the four establishings of mindfulness, one can focus on an inspiring theme—and the recollection of the Saṅgha counts as an inspiring theme—to wake up the sluggish mind, gather the scattered mind, and give rise to rapture and calm. Once the mind has gained this rapture and calm, it can drop the inspiring theme, and it will be in a state of concentration devoid of directed thought and evaluation: apparently, the second jhāna.

The Theragāthā presents two additional rewards for the practice of recollecting the Saṅgha: Thag 6:2 gives an example of a monk who, gaining no alms, nourishes himself with the rapture coming from recollecting the Saṅgha. Thag 5:8 portrays a monk who, alone in the wilderness, has fallen sick. He gains strength of heart not to retreat from the wilderness and instead to use the Dhamma to cure his illness with this reflection:

> Reflecting on those who are resolute,
> their persistence aroused,
> constantly firm in their effort,
> united in concord,
> I'll stay in the grove.

Although much of the initial appeal of the Theragāthā and Therīgāthā lies in the artistry of the poems, it's when they yield this sort of reflection that they prove most useful in the long run.

Theragāthā

Poems of the Elder Monks

Thag 1:1 Subhūti

My hut is roofed, comfortable, free of drafts;
my mind, well-centered,
    released.
I remain ardent.
    So, rain-deva.
    Go ahead & rain.

Thag 1:2 Mahā Koṭṭhita

Calmed, restrained,
giving counsel unruffled,
he shakes off evil qualities—
        as the breeze,
        a leaf from a tree.

Thag 1:3 Kaṅkhā (Doubting) Revata

See this:
the discernment
of the Tathāgatas,
like a fire ablaze in the night, giving light, giving eyes,
to those who come,
subduing their doubt.

Thag 1:6 Dabba ("Capable")

Whoever,
hard to tame,
has been tamed by taming,
—capable, contented,
crossed over doubt,
victorious, as his fears are dispersed:
He is capable,
unbound,
steadfast in mind.

Thag 1:7 Bhalliya

Who scatters the troops of the King of Death—
as a great flood,
a very weak bridge made of reeds—
        is victorious,
for his fears are dispersed.
        He's tamed,
        unbound,
        steadfast in mind.

Thag 1:10 Puṇṇamāsa

Whoever,
    a master of knowing,
    contented,[1]
    restrained in mind,
destroys longing for here & beyond, unsmeared with regard to all dhammas, would know the arising-&-disbanding of the world.

Thag 1:13 Vanavaccha

The color of blue-dark clouds,
        glistening,
cooled with the waters
of clear-flowing streams
covered with ladybugs:
        Those rocky crags
        refresh me.

Thag 1:14 Vanavaccha's pupil

My preceptor said to me:
    Let's go from here, Sīvaka.
My body stays in the village;
my mind has gone to the wilds.
Even though lying down,
    I go.
There's no tying down
    one who knows.

Thag 1:16 Belaṭṭhasīsa

Just as a fine thoroughbred steed, with swishing tail & mane runs with next-to-no effort, so my days & nights
run with next-to-no effort now that I've gained a pleasure not of the flesh.[1]

Thag 1:18 Siṅgālapitar

There was an heir to the One Awakened, a monk in the Bhesakaḷā forest, who suffused this whole earth with the perception of “bones.” Quickly, I’d say, he abandoned sensual passion.

Thag 1:21 Nigrodha

I'm not afraid
of danger,
of fear.
Our Teacher's adept
in the deathless.
Where danger, where fear
do not remain:
That's the path
by which the monks go.

Thag 1:22 Cittaka

Peacocks,
crested, blue, with gorgeous necks, cry out
in the Kāraṁvī woods, thrilled by the cold wind.
They awaken the sleeper to meditate.

Thag 1:23 Gosāla

I—having eaten honey-rice in a bamboo patch
and rightly grasping the aggregates'[1] arising-disbanding—will return to the hillside, intent on seclusion.

Thag 1:25 Nandiya (to Māra)

Like splendor, his mind, continually fruitful:
Attack a monk like that,
you Dark One,
and you'll fall
into pain.

Thag 1:26 Abhaya

Hearing the well-spoken words of the Awakened One, Kinsman of the Sun,
I pierced what is subtle—
        as if, with an arrow,
        the tip of a horse-tail hair.

Thag 1:29 Hārita

Hārita, raise yourself upright
and, straightening your mind —like a fletcher, an arrow—shatter ignorance to bits.

Thag 1:31 Gahuratīriya

Touched by gnats & mosquitoes, in the wilds, the great forest, like a nāga elephant
at the head of a battle,
        mindful,
he acquiesces to that.

Thag 1:32 Suppiya

I'll make a trade:
aging for the ageless,
burning for the unbound—
        the highest peace,
        the unexcelled rest
                from the yoke.

Thag 1:33 Sopāka

Just as one would be good to one's dear only child, one should be good to all creatures everywhere.[1]

Note

1. Notice how this image differs from a similar image in Sn 1:8:

> As a mother would risk her life
> to protect her child, her only child,
> even so should one cultivate the heart limitlessly
> with regard to all beings.

Whereas the image here draws a parallel between being good to one's child and being good to others, the image in Sn 1:8 draws a parallel between protecting one's child and protecting one's limitless attitude of goodwill to all beings.

Thag 1:39 Tissa

As if struck by a sword,
as if his head were on fire, a monk should live the wandering life
        —mindful—
for the abandoning of sensual passion.

Thag 1:41 Sirivaḍḍha

Lightning lands on the cleft between Vebhāra & Paṇḍava,[1] but,
having gone to the cleft in the mountains, he's absorbed in jhāna[2]—the son of the one without compare,
        the one who is Such.[3]

Notes

1. Mountains near Rājagaha.

2. Meditative absorption, one of the four levels of intense concentration that constitute right concentration in the noble eightfold path.

3. Such (tādin): an epithet for an arahant, indicating that his/her attainment is indefinable and not subject to change.

Thag 1:43 Sumaṅgala

So freed! So freed!
So thoroughly freed am I
from three crooked things:
my sickles, my shovels, my plows.
Even if they were here,
right here,
I'd be done with them,
done.
Do jhāna, Sumaṅgala.
Do jhāna, Sumaṅgala.
Sumaṅgala, stay heedful.

Thag 1:49 Rāmaṇeyyaka

Even with all the whistles & whistling, the calls of the birds,
this, my mind, doesn't waver, for my delight is in oneness.

Thag 1:50 Vimala

The earth's sprinkled with rain, wind
is blowing, lightning
wanders the sky,
but my thoughts are stilled,
        well-centered
        my mind.

Thag 1:56 Kuṭivihārin (1)

Who's in the hut?
A monk's in the hut—
    free from passion,
    with well-centered mind.
Know this, my friend:
    The hut you built wasn't wasted.

Thag 1:57 Kuṭivihārin (2)

This was your old hut,
        and you aspire to another,
                new hut.
Discard your hope for a hut, monk.
A new hut will be painful all over again.[1]

Note

1. See Thag 2:32, note 1.

Thag 1:61 Vappa

One who sees sees who sees,
    sees who doesn't.
One who doesn't see
            doesn't see who sees
    or who doesn't.

Thag 1:68 Ekudāniya

Of heightened awareness & heedful,
the sage trained in sagacity's ways:
He has no sorrows, one who is Such,
calmed & ever mindful.

Thag 1:73 Māṇava

On seeing an old person;
    &
a person in pain, diseased;
    &
a person dead, gone to life's end, I left
for the life gone forth, abandoning the sensuality that entices the heart.

Thag 1:75 Susārada

Good the sight
of the well-rectified:
    Doubt is cut off,
    intelligence grows.
Even fools
they make wise—
    so the company of the true is good.

Thag 1:84 Nīta

Asleep the whole night, delighting in company by day:
When, when will the fool
bring suffering & stress to an end?

Thag 1:85 Sunāga

Adept in a theme for the mind, sensing the savor of solitude, practicing jhāna,
    masterful, mindful,
        you'd attain a pleasure
        not of the flesh.[1]

Note

1. See SN 36:31.

Thag 1:86 Nāgita

Outside of this path,
the path of the many who teach other things doesn't go to unbinding as does this:
Thus the Blessed One
instructs the Saṅgha,
truly showing the palms of his hands.[1]

Note

1. This is a reference to the fact that the Buddha was an "open-handed" teacher who did not wait to the end of his life to give his most crucial teachings. See DN 16. The message of this verse may be related to the fact that the Buddha addressed three of his most plain-speaking suttas to Nāgita: AN 5:30, AN 6:42, and AN 8:103.

Thag 1:88 Ajjuna

Able was I to raise myself from water to dry land.[1]
Swept along by the great flood,
    I penetrated
    the truths.[2]

Notes

1. A standard image for the practice is that of making one's way across a river from its dangerous near shore to the safety of the further shore. For other uses of this image, see SN 35:197, AN 4:5, AN 7:15, and Sn 5.

2. The four noble truths.

Thag 1:93 Eraka

Sensual pleasures are stressful, Eraka.
Sensual pleasures aren't ease.
Whoever loves sensual pleasures loves stress, Eraka.
Whoever doesn't,
doesn't love stress.

Thag 1:95 Cakkhupāla

I'm blind,
my eyes are destroyed.
I've stumbled
on a wilderness track.
        Even
if I must crawl,
        I'll go on,
but not with an evil companion.

Thag 1:100 Devasabha

Consummate in the right exertions, the establishings of mindfulness his range,[1] blanketed with the flowers of release, he will, without effluent, totally unbind.[2]

Notes

1. The right exertions are the four aspects of right effort; the establishings of mindfulness, the four aspects of right mindfulness. See SN 45:8. On the image of the establishings of mindfulness as a monk's proper range, see SN 47:6–7.

2. Formally, this verse is noteworthy in that each of the first three lines is composed of a single long compound. This style, which became common in later Indian literature because it was considered to convey strength, is uncommonly "strong" for a verse in the Pali Canon. For a similar example, see Dhp 39.

"Effluent" here is a translation of the term āsava, which stands for three tendencies that "flow out" of the mind and lead to the flood of rebirth: sensuality, becoming, and ignorance. The Jains, contemporaries of the Buddha, also used the term "effluent" in their teachings, but the Buddhist use of the term differed from theirs in two important respects. First, for the Buddhists, effluents were mental, whereas for the Jains they were physical: sticky substances that kept what they regarded as the soul attached to the process of transmigration. Second, for the Jains a living person could become freed of the effluents only at his/her final death. Thus a living person could not be effluent-free. For the Buddhists, however, one became effluent-free at the point of total awakening. Thus a living arahant was effluent-free. Many of the speakers in the Theragāthā and Therīgāthā speak of themselves as effluent-free—see, for instance, Thag 18, Thig 5:11, Thig 14—which means that they are employing the concept in its strictly Buddhist sense.

Thag 1:101 Belaṭṭhkāni

Abandoning the householder's state, but with no mastery,
lazy, gluttonous,
using his mouth as a plough like a great hog fattened on fodder:
        Again & again
he goes to the womb—
        the dullard.

Thag 1:104 Khitaka

How light my body!
Touched by abundant
rapture & bliss,
—like a cotton tuft borne on the breeze—
it seems to be floating
—my body!

Thag 1:109 Saṅgharakkhita

Why,
having gone into solitude, does he not take account of the message of the one sympathetic
to his foremost well-being?
        Because he dwells
        with his faculties exposed,
        like a tender deer
        in the forest.

Thag 1:110 Usabha

Trees on the hilltops
are flourishing,
watered by a new high-rising cloud, giving birth to even more goodness for Usabha—
        desiring seclusion,
        conscious of “wilderness.”

Going forth is hard;
houses are hard places to live;
the Dhamma is deep;
wealth, hard to obtain;
it's hard to keep going with whatever we get:
So it's right that we ponder continually continual inconstancy.

With clear waters &
        massive boulders,
frequented by monkeys &
        deer,
covered with moss &
        water weeds:
Those rocky crags refresh me.

Thag 1:114 Adhimutta

For one heavy
        with bodily offenses,
greedy
        for carcass pleasures
while life is wasting away:
        From where will there come contemplative-excellence?

Thag 1:118 Kimbila

As if sent by a curse,[1] it drops on us—
aging.
The body seems other,
though it's still the same one.
I'm still here
& have never been absent from it, but I remember myself
as if somebody else's.

Thag 1:119 Vajjiputta

Coming to the bower
at the root of a tree, placing
        unbinding
in your heart,
do jhāna, Gotama,
& don't be heedless.
    What use is this chitter-chatter
    to you?[1]

Note

1. In SN 9:5, a deva addresses this verse to Ven. Ānanda, who has been spending too much time teaching Dhamma to laypeople.

Thag 1:120 Isidatta

The five aggregates,
having been comprehended, stand with their root
        cut through.
For me
        the ending of stress
                is reached;
        the ending of effluents,
                attained.

Thag 2:3 Valliya

A monkey,
coming to the little hut with five doors,
goes from door to door, knocking moment by moment.
    Stand still, monkey,
    don't run.
It's not yours
as it was before.
You're bound by discernment.
You won't get far away.

Thag 2:9 Gotama

At ease sleep the sages
        who are not bound to women,
        in whom
always to be protected is the truth
very hard to gain.
        Sensuality,
we've carried out
your execution.
No longer are we in your debt.
We go now to unbinding
        where,
having gone,
one doesn't
grieve.

Thag 2:11 Mahā Cunda

Listening well increases learning.
What is learned increases discernment.
Through discernment one knows the goal.
When known, the goal brings bliss.
Stay in isolated lodgings;
live for freedom from fetters.
If you don't attain delight there,
then live in the Saṅgha,
your mind protected,
mindful.

Thag 2:13 Heraññakāni

Days & nights
fly past.
Life
comes to an end.
The span of mortals
runs out,
like the water of a piddling stream.

But the fool doing evil deeds doesn't realize that later it's bitter for him:
evil for him
the result.

Thag 2:16 Mahākāla

This swarthy woman
[preparing a corpse for cremation]
        —crow-like, enormous—breaking a thigh & then the other thigh,
breaking an arm & then the other arm,
cracking open the head,
        like a pot of curds,
she sits with them heaped up beside her.

Whoever, unknowing,
makes acquisitions
        —the fool—
returns over & over
to suffering & stress.
So, discerning,
don't make acquisitions.
        May I never lie
        with my head cracked open
                again.

Thag 2:24 Valliya

What needs to be done
with firm persistence,
what needs to be done
by one who hopes for awakening, that I will do.
        I will not fail.
See: persistence & striving!

You show me the path:
        the straight,
        the plunge into deathlessness.
I, through sagacity,
will reach it, know it,
as the stream of the Ganges,
        the sea.

Thag 2:26 Puṇṇamāsa

Shedding five hindrances[1]
to reach rest from the yoke, taking the Dhamma as mirror my own knowledge & vision,

I reflected on this body—
    the whole thing,
    inside & out,
    my own & others'.
How vain & empty the body appeared!

Note

1. The five hindrances are sensual desire, ill will, sloth & drowsiness, restlessness & anxiety, and uncertainty. See SN 46:51.

Thag 2:27 Nandaka

Just as a fine thoroughbred steed stumbling, regains its stance, feeling all the more urgency, & draws its burden
        undaunted.

In the same way, remember me:
consummate in vision,
a disciple of the Rightly
Self-awakened One,
the Awakened One's thoroughbred child,
            his son.

Thag 2:30 Kaṇhadinna

Men of integrity
    have been attended to,
the Dhamma repeatedly listened to.
Having listened,
    I followed the straight way,
    the plunge into deathlessness.

Passion for becoming,[1]
    having been killed by me, no further such passion is found in me.
It neither was nor will be
    nor is found in me
        even now.

Note

1. Becoming (bhava) is a term to describe a sense of identity in a particular world of experience, which can develop on any of three levels: sensuality, form, or formlessness. Craving for becoming is one of the causes of stress and suffering; passion for becoming is one of the last fetters abandoned at full awakening. For more on the topic of becoming, see The Paradox of Becoming.

Thag 2:32 Sivaka

Inconstant little houses:
    now here,
now there,   again
        & again,
I sought the house-builder.
Painful is birth, again
        & again.
House-builder, you're seen!
You will not build a house again.
All your rafters are broken, and your gables torn down.
Released from restriction, the mind will be blown out
        right here.[1]

Note

1. Compare Dhp 153–154:

    Through the round of many births I roamed
        without reward,
        without rest,
    seeking the house-builder.
        Painful is birth again
            & again.
    House-builder, you're seen!
    You will not build a house again.
    All your rafters broken,
    the roof plate destroyed, immersed what's without limits, the mind will diffuse

right here

The night, for one who knows,

Coming into the conceit of delight, the mind impales itself on a stake.
Wherever's a stake, a chopping block,
there, only there, you turn.
You, mind, I call an unlucky die.
You, I call a mind-traitor.
You've gained a Teacher hard to gain.
Don't urge me on to my loss.

Thag 3:5 Mātaṅgaputta

It's too cold,
too hot,
too late in the evening—
people who say this,
shirking their work:
The moment passes them by.

Whoever regards cold & heat as no more than grass, doing his manly duties, won't fall away
from ease.

With my chest
I push through wild grasses—spear-grass,
ribbon-grass,
rushes—
cultivating a heart
bent on seclusion.

His limbs knotted
like a kālā plant,
his body lean & lined with veins, knowing moderation
in food & drink:
    the man of undaunted heart.

Touched by gnats & horseflies in the wilds,
    the great wood,
like an elephant
at the head of a battle:
    He, mindful,
    should stay there,
    endure.

One alone is like Brahmā,
two, like devas,
three, like a village,
more than that:

Thag 3:13 Abhibhūta

Listen, kinsmen, all of you,
as many as are assembled here.
I will teach you the Dhamma:
        Painful is birth,
        again & again.

Rouse yourselves.
        Go forth.
Apply yourselves
to the Awakened One's bidding.
Scatter the army of Death as an elephant would a shed made of reeds.

He who,
in this Dhamma & Vinaya, stays heedful,
abandoning birth,
        the wandering-on,
will put an end
to suffering & stress.

Thag 3:14 Gotama

While wandering on
I went to hell;
        went again & again
to the world of the hungry ghosts; stayed countless times, long,
in the pain of the animal womb;
        enjoyed
the human state;
went to heaven
        from time to time;
settled in the elements of form,
the elements of formlessness, neither perception, perception-less.

Ways of taking birth
are now known:
        devoid of essence,
        unstable,
        conditioned,
        always blown along.
Knowing them
as born from my self,
mindful
I went right to peace.

Thag 3:15 Hārita

Whoever wants to do later what he should have done first, falls away from the easeful state & later repents.

One should speak
as one would act, & not as one wouldn't.
When one speaks without acting,
the wise, they can tell.

How very easeful:
        unbinding,
as taught by the Rightly Self-awakened One—
                sorrowless,
                dustless,
                secure,
where stress & suffering cease.

Thag 4:8 Rāhula

In both ways
consummate,[1]
I'm known as Rāhula
the Fortunate:
because I'm the son of the Buddha, because I've the eye that sees Dhammas, because my effluents are ended, because I've no further becoming.
I'm deserving of offerings, a worthy one
a three-knowledge man,[2]
one with sight
of the deathless.

Those
blinded by sensuality
covered by the net,
veiled by the veil of craving,
bound by the Kinsman of the heedless,[3]
are like fish in the mouth of a trap.

Throwing that sensuality aside, cutting through Māra's bond, pulling out craving, root & all, cooled am I.
Unbound.

Notes

1. This phrase can be taken in two ways: (a) consummate in that he has a pure lineage on both his mother's and his father's side; and (b) consummate in that he belongs both to a well-born lineage in the worldly sense and, by means of his meditative attainments, to the lineage of the noble ones. See AN 4:28.

2. One with knowledge of past lives, knowledge of the passing away and rearising of living beings, and knowledge of the ending of mental effluents. See MN 4. This list is the Buddhist response to the brahmanical claim that a person should be a master of three knowledges. In the brahmanical case, a three-knowledge man knew the three Vedas. The Buddhists claimed that their three knowledges were superior in that they were not mere hearsay, they could be known by men and women of all castes (see Thig 13:5), and they could put an end to suffering.

3. Māra.

Thag 4:10 Dhammika

The Dhamma protects those who live by the Dhamma.
The Dhamma well-practiced brings bliss.
This—the reward
when the Dhamma's well-practiced:
One who lives by the Dhamma doesn't go to a bad destination.

For Dhamma and non-don't bear equal results.
Non-Dhamma leads you to hell;
Dhamma, to a good destination.
So you should engender desire for acts of Dhamma, rejoicing
in the One   Well-Gone,
the one   who is Such.
Standing firm in the Dhamma,
of the foremost
One Well-Gone,
his disciples are guided
—enlightened—
to the foremost refuge supreme.

Burst   is the root of the boil;
the net of craving   uprooted.
He, having ended his wandering-on,
has no stain—
like the moon

on a clear full-moon night.

Thag 5:1 Rājadatta

I, a monk, gone to the charnel ground,
saw a woman cast away,
        discarded
there in the cemetery.
Though some were disgusted, seeing her—dead, evil—
                lust appeared,
as if I were blind
        to the oozings.

In less time than it takes for rice to cook,
I got out of that place.
Mindful, alert, I
sat down to one side.
Then apt attention arose in me,
the drawbacks appeared,
        disenchantment stood
        at an even keel:

With that, my heart was released.
See the Dhamma's true rightness!
The three knowledges
have been attained;
the Awakened One's bidding,
                done.

Thag 5:8 Vakkali

Stricken by sharp, wind-like pains, you, monk, living in the forest grove —harsh, with limited range for alms—what, what will you do?

Suffusing my body
with abundant rapture & joy, & enduring what's harsh,
    I'll stay in the grove.

Developing the establishings of mindfulness, strengths, faculties,
the factors for awakening,[1]
    I'll stay in the grove.

Reflecting on those who are resolute,
their persistence aroused,
constantly firm in their effort,
united in concord,
    I'll stay in the grove.

Recollecting the One Self-awakened, self-tamed & centered,
untiring both day & night,
    I'll stay
    in the grove.

Thag 5:10 Yasadatta

Intent on quibbling,
the dullard hears the Conqueror's teaching.

He's as far from the True Dhamma as the ground is from the sky.

Intent on quibbling,
the dullard hears the Conqueror's teaching.

He wanes from the True Dhamma like the moon in the dark half of the month.

Intent on quibbling,
the dullard hears the Conqueror's teaching.

He dries up in the True Dhamma
like a fish in next to no water.

Intent on quibbling,
the dullard hears the Conqueror's teaching.

He doesn't grow in the True Dhamma,
like a rotten seed in a field.

But whoever hears the Conqueror's teaching with guarded[1] intent, doing away with effluents
—all—
realizing the unshakable, attaining the foremost peace,
—effluent-free—
totally unbinds.

The rice: gone to be threshed.
But I don't get any alms.
How will I get by?

Confident, recollect
the immeasurable Buddha.
Your body pervaded with rapture,
you'll be at the height
of continual joy.
Confident, recollect
the immeasurable Dhamma.
Your body pervaded with rapture,
you'll be at the height
of continual joy.
Confident, recollect
the immeasurable Saṅgha.
Your body pervaded with rapture,
you'll be at the height
of continual joy.

You live in the open air.
Cold are these wintry nights.
Don't suffer, overcome with the cold.
Go into your hut, with its fastened bolt.

I'll fasten the four immeasurables.[1]
With them, I'll dwell
in comfort.
I won't suffer from the cold,
dwelling
unperturbed.

Thag 6:3 Mahānāga

One in whom respect for his fellows in the holy life
    is not found,
wastes away from the True Dhamma
like a fish in next to no water.

One in whom respect for his fellows in the holy life
    is not found,
doesn't grow in the True Dhamma,
like a rotten seed in a field.

One in whom respect for his fellows in the holy life
    is not found,
is far away from unbinding
in the teaching of the Dhamma king.

One in whom respect for his fellows in the holy life
    is found,
doesn't waste away from the True Dhamma like a fish in plentiful water.

One in whom respect for his fellows in the holy life
    is found,
grows in the True Dhamma,
like an excellent seed in a field.

One in whom respect for his fellows in the holy life
    is found,
stands right in the presence of unbinding
in the teaching of the Dhamma king.

Thag 6:5 Māluṅkyaputta

When a person lives heedlessly,
his craving grows like a creeping vine.
He runs now here
        & now   there,
as if looking for fruit:
        a monkey in the forest.

If this sticky, uncouth craving
overcomes you in the world,
your sorrows grow like wild grass
        after rain.

If, in the world, you overcome
this uncouth craving, hard to escape,
sorrows roll off you,
        like water beads off
        a lotus.

To all of you gathered here
I say:
        Good fortune.
        Dig up craving
—as when seeking medicinal roots, wild grass—
        by the root.
Don't let Māra cut you down
—as a raging river, a reed—
over & over again.[1]

Do what the Buddha says.
Don't let the moment pass by.
Those for whom the moment is past
grieve, consigned to hell.[2] Heedlessness is dust.

Dust follows on heedlessness.
Through heedfulness, knowledge, pull out
your own arrow
on your own.

Thag 6:6 Sappadāsa

Twenty five years since my going forth, and no peace of awareness
—not a finger-snap's worth—
        attained.
Having gained no oneness of mind,
I was wracked with lust.
Wailing, with my arms upheld,
I ran amok from my dwelling—
"Or… or shall I take the knife?
What's the use of life to me?
If I were to renounce the training, what sort of death would I have?"

So, taking a razor,
I sat down on a bed.
And there was the razor,
placed ready to cut my own vein, when apt attention arose in me,
the drawbacks appeared,
        disenchantment stood
        at an even keel:

With that, my heart was released.
See the Dhamma's true rightness!
The three knowledges
have been attained;
the Awakened One's bidding,
                done.

Thag 6:9 Jenta, the Royal Chaplain's Son

I was drunk with the intoxication
of my birth, wealth, & sovereignty.
Drunk with the intoxication
of my body's build, coloring, & form, I wandered about,
regarding no one
as my equal or better.
Foolish, arrogant, haughty,
my banner held high.
I—disrespectful, arrogant, proud—bowed down to no one,
not even mother,
father,
or those commonly held
in respect.

Then—seeing the ultimate leader, supreme, foremost of charioteers,
like a blazing sun,
arrayed with a squadron of monks—
casting away pride & intoxication through an awareness serene & clear, I bowed down
my head to him, supreme among all living beings.

Haughtiness & contempt have been abandoned

—rooted out—
the conceit “I am” is extracted, all forms of pride, destroyed.

Thag 6:10 Sumana the Novice

When I was seven & newly gone forth,
having conquered with my power
the great powerful serpent, I was fetching water for my preceptor from the great lake, Anotatta,[1] when the Teacher saw me & said:

"Look, Sāriputta, at that one,
the young boy coming there,
carrying a pot of water, well-centered within,
his practices—inspiring;
his bearing—admirable.

He's Anuruddha's novice, mature in his powers,
made thoroughbred by a thoroughbred,
good by one who is good,
tamed by Anuruddha,
trained by one whose task is done.

He,   having reached the highest peace & realized the unshakable, Sumana the novice wants this:
'Don't let anyone know me.'"

Note

1. Anotatta: A fabulous lake located in the Himalayas, famed for the purity of its cool waters. Sumana would have had to use his psychic powers to fetch water from there.

Thag 6:12 Brahmadatta

This poem repeats a poem attributed to the Buddha in SN 7:2. The second and third stanzas also appear in a poem attributed to Sakka the deva-king in SN 11:5.

Whence is there anger
in one without anger
    tamed, calmed, living in tune, released through right knowing,
    Such?

You make things worse
    when you flare up
    at someone who's angry.
    Whoever doesn't flare up
    at someone who's angry
        wins a battle
        hard to win.

You live for the good of both
    —your own, the other's—when, knowing the other's provoked, you mindfully grow calm.

When you work the cure of both
    —your own, the other's—those who think you a fool know nothing of Dhamma.

If anger arises,
reflect on the saw simile.[1]
If craving for savor, remember the son's-flesh simile.[2]

If your mind runs loose

after sensual pleasures & states of becoming,
quickly restrain it with mindfulness as you would a bad ox eating grain.[3]

Thag 6:13 Sirimaṇḍa

Rain soddens what's covered & doesn't sodden what's exposed.
So open up what's covered up,
so that it won't get soddened by the rain.[1]

Attacked by death
    is the world,
surrounded by aging,
beset by the arrow of craving, always obscured by desire.

Attacked by death
    is the world,
& encircled by aging,
constantly beaten, with no shelter, like a thief
    sentenced to punishment.

They encroach like masses of flame, these three:
    death, aging, & illness.
There's no strength to confront them, no speed to run away.

Make the day not-in-vain,
    a little or a lot.
However much
the day passes,
that's how much less
    is life.
Your last day approaches.
    This isn't your time to be heedless.

Thag 7:1 Sundara Samudda & the Courtesan

Ornamented, finely clothed, garlanded, adorned,
her feet stained red with lac,
she wore slippers:
a courtesan.
Stepping out of her slippers—
her hands raised before me, palm-to-palm over her heart—
she softly, tenderly,
in measured words
spoke to me first:
"You are young, recluse.
Heed my message:
Partake of human sensuality.
I will give you luxury.
Truly I vow to you,
I will tend to you as to a fire.
When we are old,
both leaning on canes,
then we will both become recluses, winning the benefits of both worlds."

And seeing her before me—a courtesan, ornamented, finely clothed, hands palm-to-palm over her heart—like a snare of death laid out, apt attention arose in me,
the drawbacks appeared,
disenchantment stood
at an even keel:

With that, my heart was released.

See the Dhamma's true rightness!
The three knowledges
have been attained;
the Buddha's bidding,
done.

Thag 9 Bhūta

When, knowing, "stress, aging-&-death"— where people run-of-the-mill are attached—
comprehending stress,
the wise man does jhāna, mindful,
there's no greater enjoyment than that.

When, striking down
attachment,
the bringer of stress & craving,
the bringer of stress bound up
with objectification,
he does jhāna, mindful,
there's no greater enjoyment than that.

When, touching[1] with discernment the auspicious, two-times-four road, the ultimate path,
cleansing away all defilement,
he does jhāna, mindful,
there's no greater enjoyment than that.

When he develops the peaceful state,
—sorrowless, stainless, unfabricated,
cleansing away all defilement,
cutting through fetters & bonds—
there's no greater enjoyment than that.

When, in the sky, the thundercloud roars, with torrents of rain on all sides of the path of the birds,
and the monk, having gone to a cave, does jhāna,
there's no greater enjoyment than that.

When, seated on the bank of rivers covered with flowers, garlanded with various forest plants,
    happy at heart, he does jhāna,
    there's no greater enjoyment than that.

When, at midnight in the secluded grove,
the devas drizzle, the fanged animals roar,
and the monk, having gone to a cave, does jhāna,
    there's no greater enjoyment than that.

When, having kept his own thoughts in check, taking refuge in the mountains in a mountain fissure, free from disturbance, free from barrenness,
he does jhāna,
    there's no greater enjoyment than that.

When, happy,
destroying stain, barrenness, grief, free from door-bolts, free from underbrush, free from arrows,
having put an end to all effluents,
he does jhāna,
    there's no greater enjoyment than that.

Thag 10:1 Kāludāyin

This is a poem in at least two parts. In the first part, Ven. Kāludāyin is addressing the Buddha soon after the latter's awakening, inviting him to return home to visit his family. In the second part, Kāludāyin is addressing the Buddha's father, Suddhodana, at the time of the Buddha's return, perhaps to make Suddhodana favorably inclined to receive his son.

There is a question, though, as to where the first part ends and the second begins. The Commentary assigns only the last stanza—beginning with, "I am the son of the Buddha"—to the second part, and everything before that to the first. This, however, doesn't fit with the fact that the seventh stanza is obviously addressed to the person who engendered the Buddha, and not to the Buddha himself. For this reason, I have placed the division into two parts after the sixth stanza, as the first six stanzas are unified by the theme of bearing fruit, with the fourth and fifth stanzas possibly included to remind the Buddha of the good results that would come to his family if he provided them with the opportunity to give him alms. Alternatively, the division could be placed after the fourth stanza, in that the fifth stanza could be interpreted as beginning a line of thought aimed at putting the listener into the proper mood to accept the principle of the results of good kamma seen not in this lifetime but in the next.

Covered in embers now are the trees, shedding their canopy, lord, in search of fruit.
As if flaring up, they glow.
The time, great hero, partakes of savors.

The trees in bloom, delightful, waft delights
all around, in all directions, dropping their petals in hope of fruit.
Now, O hero, is the time to set forth.

Neither too cold nor too hot:
pleasant the season, lord, fit for a journey.

Let them see you—the Sakyans & Koliyans—facing west, crossing in the Rohiṇī.[1]

In hope they plow the field.
In hope the seed is sown.
In hope do merchants go to sea, bringing back wealth.
Let the hope in which I stand bear fruit.[2]

Again & again they sow the seed.[3]
Again & again the deva-kings rain.
Again & again farmers plow the fields.
Again & again grain comes to the kingdom.

Again & again beggars wander.
Again & again lords of giving give.
Again & again having given, the lords of giving again & again go to the heavenly place.

* * *

Truly, an enlightened[4] one of deep discernment cleanses, back for seven generations, the family in which he's born.
I would imagine you to be Sakka,[5] the deva of devas for you engendered a sage truly named.

Suddhodana is the name of the Great Seer's father, and Māyā name of the Buddha's mother[6] who, having nurtured the bodhisatta with her womb, at the break-up of the body, rejoices in the threefold divine realm.[7]

She, Gotamī, having passed away, having fallen away from here,
is now endowed with heavenly sensual pleasures.
She rejoices in the five strings of sensuality, surrounded by those groups of devas.

I am the son of the Buddha, who endures what is hard to endure—Aṅgīrasa[8]: incomparable, Such.

You, Sakka, are my father's father.
In the Dhamma, Gotama,
you are my grandfather.

Notes

1. Rohiṇī is the name both of a river at the edge of the Sakyan lands and of an asterism, i.e., a star in the zodiac used to indicate a season of time.

2. Reading vipaccatu with the Thai edition, which seems to fit better with the imagery in the earlier part of the poem than the reading in the other editions—samijjhatu, "may it succeed."

3. Reading kasate with the Thai edition.

4. Reading dhīro with the Thai edition. The other editions read vīro, "hero."

5. Sakka is the name of the king of the devas of the heaven of the Thirty-three. Ven. Kāludāyin is playing here with the similarity between this name and that of the Sakyan lineage.

6. Reading Māyanāmā with the Sri Lankan and PTS editions. The Thai edition reads Māyā mahesī, so that the line would read, "The Buddha's mother is Queen Māyā." This would provide a play on words—mahesi, great seer, and mahesī, queen—but there is nothing in the early suttas to indicate that Suddhodana was a king, or Māyā a queen.

7. The Commentary identifies the threefold divine realm as the Tusita (Contented) heaven, but doesn't explain why that heaven would be given this name. Some verses in the Jātaka identify the threefold divine realm as the heaven of the Thirty-three, and the later reference to "those groups of devas" in this poem would seem to support this latter interpretation.

8. An epithet for the Buddha, meaning "resplendent." Aṅgīrasa was the name of an ancient brahmanical sage to which the Gotama clan claimed a connection. The Commentary suggests that this was one of the bodhisatta's personal names prior to his awakening.

Thag 10:2 Ekavihāriya—"Dwelling Alone"

This poem, which is attributed to King Asoka's younger brother, falls into three parts: The first expresses his initial desire to leave the life of the palace and go into the forest; the second depicts his going forth; and the third announces his awakening. Some scholars have suggested that many of the poems dealing with events in the lives of the early Buddhist monks and nuns may have originally been intended for dramatic performance, and this poem could easily have been written with that intent. The language of the original, with its heavy use of poetic terms, certainly indicates that the author had a literary background and was writing for a sophisticated audience.

If, in front or behind,
there is no one else,
it's extremely pleasant for one staying alone
in the forest.

Come then! Alone
I will go to the wilderness praised by the Awakened One pleasant for a resolute monk dwelling alone.

Alone,
astute in my goal,
I'll quickly enter the grove —refreshing,
giving rapture
to meditators—
the haunt
of elephants in rut.

When the Cool Forest's in full flower,
in a cool mountain gorge, having bathed my limbs

I'll walk back & forth
alone.

Ah, when will I dwell,
alone and free from companions, in the refreshing great forest—
my task done,
effluent-free?

As I desire to do this,
may my purpose succeed.
I myself
will bring it about.
No one can do it
for anyone else.

* * *

I myself
bind on my armor.
I will enter the grove
and will not emerge
without having attained the end of the effluents.

While soft breezes blow—
cool,
heavily, fragrantly scented—I'll make ignorance burst, as I sit on a mountaintop.

In the forest covered with blossoms or perhaps on a cool hillside, blessed with the bliss of release, on Giribbaja I'll delight.[1]

* * *

I am now he whose resolves are fulfilled like the moon on a full-moon night.
With effluents all

totally ended,
there is now no further becoming.

Note

1. Giribbaja is the ring of mountains surrounding Vulture's Peak.

Thag 10:5 Kappa

Full of the many clans of impurities, the great manufacturer of excrement,
like a stagnant pool,
    a great tumor,
    great wound,
full of blood & lymph,
immersed in a cesspool, trickling liquids, the body is oozing foulness—always.
Bound together with sixty sinews, plastered with a stucco of muscle, wrapped in a jacket of skin,
this foul body is of no worth at all.
Linked together with a chain of bones, stitched together with tendon-threads, it produces its various postures, from being hitched up together.

Headed surely to death,
in the presence of the King of Mortality, the man who learns to discard it right here, goes wherever he wants.

Covered with ignorance,
the body's tied down with a four-fold tie,[1] sunk in the floods,[2] caught in the net of obsessions,[3] conjoined with five hindrances,[4] given over to thought,
    accompanied with the root of craving, roofed with delusion's roofing.
That's how the body functions, compelled by the compulsion of kamma, but its attainment ends

in ruin.
Its many becomings go
to ruin.

These who hold to this body as mine
—blind fools, people run-of-the-mill—fill the horrific cemetery, taking on further becoming.
Those who stay uninvolved with this body
—as they would with a serpent smeared with dung—
disgorging the root of becoming,[5]
will, without effluent, totally unbind.

Notes

1. The four-fold tie: greed, ill will, attachment to habits & practice, and dogmatic obsession with views.

2. Floods: sensuality, becoming, views, and ignorance. See SN 45:171. These are identical with the four yokes. See AN 4:10.

3. Obsessions: sensual passion, resistance, views, uncertainty, conceit, passion for becoming, and ignorance. See AN 7:11–12.

4. Hindrances: sensual desire, ill will, sloth & drowsiness, restlessness & anxiety, and uncertainty. See DN 2 and SN 46:51.

5. The root of becoming: craving.

Thag 10:7 Gotama

You should know what's to your benefit.
You should take a good look at the Buddha's word & at what's fitting here for one who has entered on the contemplative life.

An admirable friend right here, undertaking the complete training, & obedience to teachers:
    This is fitting
    for a contemplative.

Respect for the Buddhas, honoring the Dhamma
as it has come to be,
& thinking highly of the Saṅgha:
    This is fitting
    for a contemplative.

Fitting behavior & range of association,
a livelihood purified, blameless,
the establishing of the mind:
    This is fitting
    for a contemplative.

Virtuous in what you do & what you abstain from doing, inspiring comportment,
commitment to the heightened mind:
    This is fitting
    for a contemplative.

Wilderness lodgings,

secluded, with next-to-no noise,
right for sages to resort to:
This is fitting
for a contemplative.

Virtue, learning, investigating
phenomena,
mental qualities,
as they have come to be:
This is fitting
for a contemplative.

You should develop
inconstancy,
the perception of not-self,
the perception of unattractiveness, & distaste for the world:
This is fitting
for a contemplative.

You should develop
the factors for awakening,
the bases for success,
the faculties,
& the noble eightfold path:
This is fitting
for a contemplative.

A sage should abandon craving, should cut through the effluents, root & all, should dwell fully released:
This is fitting
for a contemplative.

Thag 11 Saṅkicca

Ven. Saṅkicca ordained as a novice at the age of seven, and is reported to have attained arahantship as his head was being shaved prior to his ordination. In the first of the following verses attributed to him, he engages himself in a rhetorical conversation while sitting in a rainy forest.

What do you want in the woods, my boy, like a bird[1] exposed to the rain?
Monsoons refresh you,
for seclusion is for those in jhāna.

As the monsoon wind drives the clouds in the rainy season, so thoughts concerned with seclusion impel me.

* * *

A black crow
making its home in a charnel ground inspires within me mindfulness in—based on dispassion for—the body.[2]

* * *

One whom others don't guard, who doesn't guard others:
He is a monk
who lies down in ease, unconcerned with sensual passions.

* * *

With clear waters &
    massive boulders,
frequented by monkeys &

deer,
covered with moss &
water weeds:
Those rocky crags
refresh me.

* * *

I've lived in wildernesses, canyons, & caves,
isolated dwellings
frequented by predator & prey, but never have I known
an ignoble, aversive resolve:
"May these beings
be destroyed,
be slaughtered,
fall into pain."

* * *

The Teacher has been served by me;
the Awakened One's bidding,
done;
the heavy load, laid down;
the guide to becoming,[3] uprooted.
And the goal for which I went forth
from home life into homelessness I've reached:
the end
of all fetters.

I don't delight in death,
don't delight in living.
I await my time
as a worker his wage.
I don't delight in death,
don't delight in living.
I await my time,
mindful, alert.

Notes

1. Ujjuhāna. The Commentary offers two interpretations for this word. The first is that it is a hill covered with jungle and many streams that tended to overflow in the rainy season. The other is that it is the name of a bird that could stay comfortable even when exposed to cold, wind, and rain. I've chosen the second alternative. K. R. Norman speculates that the term could be written ujjahāna, in which case it would be the present participle for a verb meaning "abandoned" or "cast off." However, none of the manuscripts support his speculation.

2. In other words, the sight of the crow taking up residence in skulls and other body parts provided a chastening perspective on how the mind takes up residence in the body.

3. The guide to becoming is craving.

Thag 12:1 Sīlavat

Here master the virtue that in this world is well-mastered, for virtue, when cultivated, brings every consummation near.

Wise, one should protect one's virtue, aspiring to three pleasures:
praise, the gaining of wealth, and—after death—rejoicing in heaven.

The virtuous one, through restraint, acquires many friends,
while the unvirtuous one, practicing evil,
from friends is estranged.

The unvirtuous person gains disrepute & dishonor;
the virtuous person, always,
repute, honor, & praise.

Virtue is the beginning, the establishing,
the mother of what is fine,
the foremost of all qualities:
    Therefore virtue should be purified.

Virtue is also control, restraint,
the delight of the mind,
the ford of all Buddhas:
    Therefore virtue should be purified.

Virtue: an incomparable strength.
Virtue: the ultimate weapon.
Virtue: the highest adornment.
Virtue: an astounding coat of mail.
Virtue: an imposing bridge.

Virtue: an unexcelled fragrance.
Virtue: the highest fragrant ointment by which one wafts
this direction & that.
Virtue: the supreme provision.
Virtue: the ultimate food for the journey.
Virtue: the highest vehicle by which one goes[1]
this direction & that.

Right here he gains blame,
and after death, in deprivation, he's unhappy at heart:
Everywhere the fool
is unhappy at heart,
not concentrated on virtues.

Right here he gains honor and after death, in heaven,
is happy at heart:
Everywhere the enlightened one
is happy at heart,
well-concentrated on virtues.

Here virtue is supreme,
but one with discernment is the ultimate.
Among human beings & devas one conquers
through virtue & discernment.

Note

1. Reading yāti with the PTS and Sinhalese editions. The Thai has vāti —"wafts"—which seems to be a mistake.

Thag 12:2 Sunīta the Outcaste

Into a lowly family I was born, poor, with next to no food.
My work was degrading:
I gathered the spoiled, the withered flowers from shrines and threw them away.
People found me disgusting, despised me, disparaged me.
Lowering my heart,
I showed reverence to many.

Then I saw the One Self-awakened,
arrayed with a squadron of monks,
the Great Hero, entering the city, supreme, of the Magadhans.
Throwing down my carrying pole,
I approached him to do reverence.
He—the supreme man—stood still out of sympathy just
    for me.
After paying homage
to the feet of the teacher,
    I stood to one side & requested the Going Forth from him, supreme among all living beings.

The compassionate Teacher, sympathetic to all the world, said:
    "Come, monk."
That was my formal Acceptance.

Alone, I stayed in the wilds,

untiring,
I followed the Teacher's words,
just as he, the Conqueror, had taught me.

In the first watch of the night,
I recollected previous lives;
in the middle watch,
purified the divine eye;
in the last,
burst the mass of darkness.

Then, as night was ending & the sun returning,
Indra & Brahmā came to pay homage to me, hands palm-to-palm at their hearts:
"Homage to you,
O thoroughbred of men,
Homage to you,
O man supreme,
whose effluents are ended.
You, dear sir,
are worthy of offerings."

Seeing me,
arrayed with a squadron of devas,
the Teacher smiled & said:
"Through austerity, celibacy,
restraint, & self-control:
That's how one is a brahman.
He is a brahman supreme."

Thag 13 Soṇa Koḷivisa

Who once was highly exalted in the state, having gone into the service of the king of Aṅga,[1] today is exalted in qualities:
    Soṇa, gone beyond suffering.

Five should be cut, five abandoned, and five above all developed.
Having gone past five bonds,[2] a monk is said to be one who's crossed over.

For a monk who is insolent, heedless, wishing for what's outside,
virtue, concentration, & discernment
    don't go to completion, because what should be done is cast aside,
what shouldn't be done is done.
For those who are insolent, heedless, their effluents increase.

But those whose mindfulness immersed in the body is constantly well-undertaken,
—who don't engage in what shouldn't be done,
who persevere in what should be done,
        mindful, alert—
    their effluents go to their end.

Go by the straight path pointed out, don't turn back.
You yourself should reprove yourself[3] should advance to unbinding.

When I overexerted my effort,
the Teacher unexcelled in the world,

the One with Eyes,
making the lute simile,
taught me the Dhamma.
I, having heard his words,
dwelled delighting in his bidding.
I practiced in tune,[4] attaining the foremost goal.
The three knowledges are attained.
The Buddha's bidding, done.

When one's awareness is dedicated[5] to renunciation, seclusion, non-afflictiveness, the ending of clinging,
the ending of craving, & non-deludedness, seeing the arising of the sense media,
the mind is rightly released.
For that monk, rightly released, his heart at peace.
There's nothing to be done, nothing to add
to what's done.

As a single mass of rock isn't moved by the wind, even so all forms, flavors, sounds, aromas, contacts,
ideas desirable & not,
have no effect on one who is Such.
The mind
—still, totally released—focuses on their passing away.

Notes

1. Ven. Soṇa's story is told in AN 6:55 and Mv V.1. The Mahāvagga version states that he was a native of Aṅga, but says nothing about his having been in the service of the king.

2. According to the Commentary, the five that should be cut are the five lower fetters; the five that should be abandoned are the five higher fetters (see AN 10:13); the five that should be developed are the five faculties: conviction, persistence, mindfulness, concentration, and discernment (see SN 48:10). The five bonds are passion, aversion, delusion, conceit, and views.

3. This line also appears in Dhp 379.

4. The Thai, Burmese, and Sri Lankan editions here read samathaṁ, "tranquility." However, I have chosen to follow the PTS edition in reading samataṁ, "in tune," which seems to fit better with the message of the simile. Throughout ancient cultures, the terminology of music was used to describe the moral quality of people and actions. Discordant intervals or poorly-tuned musical instruments were metaphors for evil; harmonious intervals and well-tuned instruments, metaphors for good. For more on this point, see MN 61, note 2, and The Wings to Awakening, I.A.

5. From this line to the end is the poem that, according to AN 6:55 and Mv V.1.27, was part of Ven. Soṇa's declaration of arahantship to the Buddha.

Thag 14:1 Revata's Farewell

Since I went forth
from home into homelessness,
I haven't known
an ignoble, aversive resolve.
"May these beings
        be destroyed,
        be slaughtered,
        fall into pain"—
I've not known this resolve in this long, long time.
But I have known goodwill, unlimited,
        fully developed,
        nurtured step after step,
as taught by the One Awake:
        to all, a friend;
        to all, a comrade;
        for all beings, sympathetic.[1]

And I develop a mind of goodwill, delighting in non-malevolence
                —always.
    Unvanquished, unshaken,
    I gladden the mind.
    I develop the sublime abiding, not frequented by the lowly.

Attaining no-thinking,
    the disciple of the Rightly
    Self-awakened One

is endowed with noble silence[2]
straightaway.

As a mountain of rock
is unmoving,
firmly established,
so a monk,
with the ending of delusion,
like a mountain,
doesn't quake.

To a person without blemish,
in constant quest of what's pure,
a hair-tip of evil
seems a storm cloud.

As a frontier fortress is guarded
within & without,
you should safeguard yourselves.
Don't let the moment
pass you by.

I don't delight in death,
don't delight in living.
I await my time
like a worker his wage.
I don't delight in death,
don't delight in living.
I await my time,
mindful, alert.

The Teacher has been served by me;
the Awakened One's bidding,
done;
the heavy load, laid down;
the guide to becoming, uprooted.
And the goal for which I went forth
from home life into homelessness I've reached:
the end

of all fetters.

Attain consummation
through heedfulness:
That is my message.

So then, I'm about to unbind.
I'm released
everywhere.[3]

Notes

1. On the development of goodwill as an unlimited attitude, see MN 21 and SN 42:8.

2. Noble silence = the second jhāna.

3. AN 3:77 and AN 3:78 use the analogy of a field to describe becoming, in which kamma is the field, craving the moisture, and consciousness the seed. The logic of the analogy suggests that if consciousness is not watered by craving, and does not land in any place (see SN 12:64), it is like a seed without moisture or a field. Therefore it will not sprout into further becoming. Poems in the Canon often describe the arahant as being "everywhere released" (sabbattha vimutto—see Dhp 348) or "everywhere independent" (sabbattha anissito—see Sn 4:6), referring indirectly to this analogy. Translators, lacking a sense of the underlying image of the idiom, have tended to render it in more prosaic terms: "completely released in every respect," "not dependent on anything," "released from everything." However, in light of the field analogy, the idiom means precisely what it says: The arahant is released from every possible "where," whether fabricated or not—every possible spot for renewed becoming.

Thag 14:2 Godatta

Just as a fine, well-bred bull yoked to a load,
enduring his load,
crushed
by the heavy burden,
doesn't throw down his yoke;
so, too, those who are filled with discernment
—as the ocean, with water—don't look down on others.
This is nobility among beings.

Having fallen in time
under the sway of time, having come under the sway of becoming & not-,
people fall subject to pain & they grieve.

Elated by causes of pleasure, cast down by causes of pain, fools are destroyed
by both,
not seeing them
for what they are.
While those who, in the midst of
pleasure & pain
have gone past the seamstress—craving—, stand firm
like a boundary pillar, neither elated nor cast down.

Not to gain or loss
not to status or honor,

not to praise or blame,
not to pleasure or pain:
Everywhere
they do not adhere—like a water bead
on a lotus.
Everywhere
they are happy, the enlightened,[1] everywhere
undefeated.

No matter what the unrighteous gain
or the righteous loss, righteous loss is better than if there were unrighteous gain.
No matter what
the status of the unaware or the lowliness of those who know, the lowliness of those who know
is better,
not the status of those unaware.
No matter what
the praise from fools
or the censure from those who know, the censure from those who know
is better than if there were praise from fools.
And as for the pleasure from sensuality
and the pain from seclusion, the pain from seclusion
is better than if there were pleasure

from sensuality.
And as for living through unrighteousness and dying for righteousness, dying for righteousness
is better, than if one were to live through unrighteousness.

Those who've abandoned
sensuality & anger,
whose minds are calmed
from becoming & non-,
go through the world
unattached.
For them there is nothing
dear or undear.
Developing
the factors for awakening, faculties,
& strengths,
attaining the foremost peace,
they, without effluent, totally unbind.

Note

1. Reading dhīrā with the Thai and Sinhalese editions. The PTS edition has vīrā, "heroes."

Thag 15:2 Udāyin

In AN 6:43, Ven. Udāyin recites these verses spontaneously in the Buddha's presence after the king's elephant (nāga) has passed by, and the Buddha defines the foremost nāga in these terms: "But, Udāyin, whoever in this world—with its devas, Māras, & Brahmās, its people with their contemplatives & brahmans, their royalty & commonfolk—does no misdeed in body, speech, or mind: That's whom I call a nāga." The Buddha's definition hints at a play on words: "Does no misdeed," in Pali, is āguṁ na karoti, which could be rephrased as na āguṁ karoti, yielding a play on the word nāga. In these verses, Ven. Udāyin shows that he has picked up on the hint by rephrasing it in precisely that way.

A human being, self-awakened, his mind tamed, concentrated, traveling along the Brahmā road, delighting in the stilling of the mind:
He, having gone beyond all dhammas,[1]
to whom human beings pay homage, the devas pay homage as well—so I have heard from the Worthy One —to him, gone past all fetters, gone from the forest to the clearing,[2] delighting in the renunciation of sensuality, released like gold from its ore.

He, the nāga outshining all others,
as the Himalayas, rocky hills:
Among all things named nāga, he, unexcelled, is truly named.

I will praise the nāga to you—for he does no misdeed.
Composure & harmlessness are the nāga's two feet.

Austerity & celibacy
are the nāga's two other feet.
Conviction is the great nāga's trunk, his hand;[3]
equanimity, his white tusks.
Mindfulness his neck; his head:
    discernment,
    discrimination,
    reflection on dhammas;
Dhamma the balanced heat of his digestion;
seclusion his tail.
He, in jhāna, delighting in assurance, inwardly well-concentrated,
the nāga, when going, is concentrated,
when standing, the nāga is concentrated,
when reclining, the nāga is concentrated,
when sitting, the nāga is concentrated.
Everywhere he's restrained, the nāga:
That is the nāga's consummation.

He eats what is blameless;
doesn't eat what is not;
on gaining food & clothing, doesn't store it up.
Having cut all bonds,
fetters tiny & large,
wherever he goes,
he goes without longing.
Like a white lotus, born & growing in the water, but not smeared by the water —fragrant, delightful—
even so the awakened one,
well-born in the world, lives in the world, but is not smeared by the world,
like the lotus, by the water.

A great blazing fire
    unnourished grows calm, and though its embers exist[4]

    is described as unbound:
Conveying an instructive meaning, this image is taught by the observant.
Great nāgas will recognize the nāga as taught by the nāga as free from passion,
    free from aversion,
        free from delusion,
            effluent-free.
His body discarded, the nāga
    will, without effluent,
        totally unbind.

Notes

1. On the point that arahants have gone beyond all dhammas, see AN 3:137, note 1.

2. Clearing = nibbāna, which is here presented as a play on the word, vana, or forest.

3. In Pali, an elephant's trunk is called its "hand" (hattha). In fact, one of the words for "elephant" is hatthin, "one having a hand."

4. Aṅgāresu ca santesu. The phrase is apparently meant as a play on words, in that santesu can be the locative either of santa, calm, or sant, existing. Either possibility fits into what seems to be point of this last section of the poem, which is to provide an image to illustrate the difference between the sa-upādisesa-nibbāna of the living arahant—literally, unbinding with fuel remaining—and the anupādisesa-nibbāna of the arahant who has passed away—literally, unbinding with no fuel remaining. In other words, the unbinding of the living arahant is like a fire that has grown calm and whose embers are calm but still warm; the unbinding of the arahant after death is like a fire whose embers have grown totally cold.

Iti 44 describes the property of sa-upādisesa-nibbāna as follows: "His [the arahant's] five sense faculties still remain and, owing to their being intact, he experiences the pleasing & the displeasing, and is sensitive to pleasure & pain. His ending of passion, aversion, & delusion is termed the unbinding property with fuel remaining." Its description of the property of anupādisesa-nibbāna is: "For him, all that is sensed, being unrelished, will grow cold right here. This is termed the unbinding property with no fuel remaining." For further discussion of this distinction, see The Mind Like Fire Unbound, chapter 1.

Thag 16:1 Adhimutta & the Bandits

The bandit chief:

"Those who
        for the sake of sacrifice for the sake of wealth
we have killed in the past, against their will have trembled & babbled
        from fear.
But you—
        you show no fear;
        your complexion brightens.
Why don't you lament
in the face of what's greatly to be feared?"

Ven. Adhimutta:

"There are no painful mind-states, chieftain,
in one without longing.
In one whose fetters are ended,
all fears are overcome.
With the ending of [craving]
the guide to becoming,
when phenomena are seen
        for what they are,
then as in the laying down of a burden,
there's no fear in death.

I've lived well the holy life,
well-developed the path.
Death holds no fear for me.
It's like the end of a disease.

I've   lived well the holy life,
        well-developed the path,

seen states of becoming as devoid of allure,
like poison spit out
after it's drunk.

One gone to the far shore without clinging,
effluent-free,
his task completed, welcomes the ending of life,
as if freed from a place of execution.
Having attained the supreme Rightness, unconcerned with all the world,
as if released from a burning house, he doesn't sorrow at death.

Whatever's compounded,
wherever a state of becoming's obtained,
all that has no one in charge:
So says the Great Seer.
Whoever discerns this,
as taught by the Awakened One, would no more grasp hold of any state of becoming than he would
a hot iron ball.
I have no 'I was,'
no 'I will be.'
Fabrications will simply go out of existence.
What's to lament there in that?
For one who sees, as it actually is,
the pure arising of phenomena,
the pure seriality of fabrications, there's no fear.

When seeing the world,
with discernment,
as on a par

with grass & twigs,
finding no 'mine-ness,' thinking, 'There's nothing of mine,' he feels no sorrow.
Dissatisfied with this carcass, I'm unconcerned with becoming.
This body will break up and there will not be another.
Do as you like with this carcass.
From that I will feel neither hatred nor love."

Hearing these awesome, hair-raising words, the young men threw down their weapons & said:

"What have you done, sir,
or who have you taken as mentor?
Because of whose teachings is this lack of sorrow acquired?"

Ven. Adhimutta:

"The all-knowing,
all-seeing conqueror:
He is my mentor.
Greatly compassionate teacher,
all the world's healer,
this doctrine is his,
unexcelled, leading to ending.
Because of his teachings is this lack of sorrow acquired."

The bandits, hearing the good words of the seer, threw down their swords & their weapons.
Some relinquished their life of crime,
some chose the Going-forth.
Having gone forth in the teachings
of the One Well-Gone,
developing the strengths & factors for awakening,[1]

wise, happy,
exultant in mind,
their faculties ripened,
they touched uncompounded unbinding.

Note

Thag 16:4 Raṭṭhapāla

The verses here fall into three sections, with the first two relating to Raṭṭhapāla's story as told in MN 82. In the first, Raṭṭhapāla is addressing his father after the latter had tried to use wealth and Raṭṭhapāla's former wives to lure Ratthapala into disrobing. In the second section, Raṭṭhapāla is talking to King Koravya, who had asked him why he had ordained when he was still young and healthy, and had suffered no loss of relatives or wealth.

The third section of verses here does not occur in MN 82.

Look at the image beautified,
a heap of festering wounds, shored up:
ill, but the object
    of many resolves,
where there is nothing
    lasting or sure.[1]

Look at the form beautified with earrings & gems:
        a skeleton wrapped in skin,
        made attractive with clothes.

Feet reddened with henna, a face smeared with powder:
        enough to deceive a fool,
        but not a seeker for the further shore.

Hair plaited in eight pleats, eyes smeared with unguent:
        enough to deceive a fool,
        but not a seeker for the further shore.

Like a newly painted unguent pot—a putrid body adorned:
        enough to deceive a fool,

but not a seeker for the further shore.

The hunter set out the snares, but the deer didn't go near the trap.
Having eaten the bait,
we go,
leaving the hunters
to weep.

The hunter's snares are broken;
the deer didn't go near the trap.
Having eaten the bait,
we go,
leaving the hunters
to grieve.[2]

* * *

I see in the world
people with wealth
who, from delusion,
don't make a gift
of the treasure they've gained.
Greedy, they stash it away, hoping for even more
sensual pleasures.

A king who, by force,
has conquered the world and rules over the earth to the edge of the sea, dissatisfied with the ocean's near shore, longs for the ocean's far shore as well.

Kings & others
—plenty of people—
go to death with craving unabated. Unsated, they leave the body behind, having not had enough of the world's sensual pleasures.

One's relatives weep & pull out their hair.
'Oh woe, our loved one is dead,' they cry.
Carrying him off,
wrapped in a piece of cloth,
they place him
    on a pyre,
    then set him on fire.

So he burns, poked with sticks,
in just one piece of cloth, leaving all his possessions behind.
They are not shelters for one who has died—not relatives,
    friends,
    or companions.

Heirs take over his wealth, while the being goes on,
in line with his kamma.
No wealth at all
follows the dead one—
    not children, wives,
    dominion, or riches.

Long life
can't be gotten with wealth, nor aging
warded off with treasure.
The wise say this life is next to nothing—
    impermanent,
    subject to change.

The rich & the poor
touch the touch of Death.
The foolish & wise
are touched by it, too.

But while fools lie as if slain by their folly, the wise don't tremble
when touched by the touch.

Thus the discernment by which one attains to mastery, is better than wealth—
for those who haven't reached mastery go from existence to existence, out of delusion,
    doing bad deeds.

One goes to a womb
& to the next world,
falling into the wandering on
    —one thing
    after another—
while those of weak discernment, trusting in one,
also go to a womb
& to the next world.

Just as an evil thief caught at the break-in is destroyed
    by his own act,
so evil people
—after dying, in the next world—are destroyed
    by their own acts.

Sensual pleasures—
    variegated,
    enticing,
    sweet—
in various ways disturb the mind.
Seeing the drawbacks in sensual objects:
that's why, O king, I went forth.

Just like fruits, people fall

—young & old—
at the break-up of the body.
Knowing this, O king,
I went forth.
The contemplative life is better for sure.[3]

* * *

Out of conviction,
I went forth
equipped with the Victor's message.
Blameless[4] was my going-forth:
Debtless I eat my food.

Seeing sensuality as burning,
gold as a knife,
pain in the entry into the womb & great danger in hells—seeing this peril, I was then dismayed—pierced (with dismay),
then calmed
on attaining the end of the effluents.
The Teacher has been served by me;
the Awakened One's bidding,
done;
the heavy load, laid down;
the guide to becoming,[5] uprooted.

And the goal for which I went forth
from home life into homelessness I've reached:
the end
of all fetters.

Notes

1. This verse = Dhp 147.
2. This verse is not contained in MN 82.
3. The verses in MN 82 end here.

4. Avajjā. The Burmese and Sinhalese editions of the Pali Canon read avañjhā, or "not barren."

5. The guide to becoming is craving.

Thag 16:7 Bhaddiya Kāligodhāyaputta

These verses contain the Canon's only complete list of the thirteen ascetic (dhutaṅga) practices. Bhaddiya's story is told in Ud 2:10.

Whatever the fine clothes I wore when astride the elephant's neck, whatever the fine rice I ate, the pure meat sauce,
today—fortunate, persevering,
delighting in whatever falls into his bowl,
Bhaddiya, son of Godhā,
does jhāna without clinging.

Wearing cast-off cloth, persevering,
delighting in whatever falls into his bowl,
Bhaddiya, son of Godhā,
does jhāna without clinging.

Going for alms, persevering,
delighting in whatever falls into his bowl,
Bhaddiya, son of Godhā,
does jhāna without clinging.

Wearing only one triple set of robes, persevering…

Bypassing no donors on his alms round, persevering…

Eating only one meal a day, persevering…

Eating from the bowl, persevering…

Refusing food brought afterwards, persevering…

Living in the wilderness, persevering…

Living at the foot of a tree, persevering…

Living in the open air, persevering…

Living in a cemetery, persevering…

Accepting whatever lodging he's assigned, persevering,

Not lying down, persevering,
delighting in whatever falls into his bowl,
Bhaddiya, son of Godhā,
does jhāna without clinging.

Modest, persevering…

Content, persevering…

Secluded, persevering…

Unentangled, persevering…

Energy aroused, persevering,
delighting in whatever falls into his bowl,
Bhaddiya, son of Godhā,
does jhāna without clinging.

Abandoning a 100-carat bowl of bronze and a 100-weight bowl of gold,
I took instead a bowl of clay:
    That was my second consecration.

In the midst of high encircling walls, strong battlements & gates, guarded by men with swords in hand—trembling
    I used to live.
Today, fortunate, unafraid, with fear & terror abandoned,
Bhaddiya, son of Godhā,
having plunged into the forest,
    does jhāna.

Standing firm in the aggregate of virtue, developing mindfulness & discernment, step by step I attained
    the ending of all fetters.

Thag 16:8 Aṅgulimāla

Aṅgulumāla's story is told in MN 86.

Aṅgulimāla:
"While walking, contemplative, you say, 'I have stopped.'
But when I have stopped you say that I haven't.
I ask you the meaning of this:
How have you stopped?
How haven't I?"

The Buddha:
"I have stopped, Aṅgulimāla, once & for all,
having cast off violence toward all living beings.
You, though,
are unrestrained toward beings.
That's how I've stopped and you haven't."

Aṅgulimāla:
"At long last a greatly revered great seer for my sake
has come to the great forest.
Having heard your verse
in line with the Dhamma,
I will go about having abandoned evil."

So saying, the bandit hurled his sword & weapons over a cliff

into a chasm,
a pit.
Then the bandit paid homage to the feet of the One Well-Gone, and right there requested the Going-forth.

The Awakened One,
the compassionate great seer,
the teacher of the world, along with its devas, said to him then:
"Come, monk."
That in itself
was monkhood for him.

* * *

Aṅgulimāla:

Who once was heedless,
but later is not,
brightens the world
like the moon set free from a cloud.[1]
His evil-done deed
is replaced with skillfulness:
He brightens the world
like the moon set free from a cloud.[2]

Whatever young monk devotes himself
to the Buddha's bidding:
He brightens the world
like the moon set free from a cloud.

May even my enemies
hear talk of the Dhamma.
May even my enemies
devote themselves
to the Buddha's bidding.
May even my enemies
associate with those people who—peaceful, good—

get others to accept the Dhamma.
May even my enemies
hear the Dhamma time & again from those who advise endurance, forbearance,
who praise non-opposition,
and may they follow it.

For surely he wouldn't harm me,
or anyone else;
he would attain the foremost peace,
would protect the feeble & firm.

Irrigators guide the water.
Fletchers shape the arrow shaft.
Carpenters shape the wood.
The wise control
themselves.[3]

Some tame with a blunt stick, with hooks, & with whips
But without blunt or bladed weapons I was tamed by the one who is Such.

"Doer of No Harm" is my name, but I used to be a doer of harm.
Today I am true to my name, for I harm no one at all.

A bandit
I used to be,
renowned as Aṅgulimāla.
Swept along by a great flood,
I went to the Buddha as refuge.

Bloody-handed
I used to be,
renowned as Aṅgulimāla.
See my going for refuge!
Uprooted is [craving],
the guide to becoming.

Having done the type of kamma that would lead to many
bad destinations,
touched by the fruit of [that] kamma, unindebted, I eat my food.[4]

They're addicted to heedlessness
—dullards, fools—
while one who is wise
cherishes heedfulness
as his highest wealth.[5]

Don't give way to heedlessness
    or to intimacy
    with sensual delight—
for a heedful person,
absorbed in jhāna,
attains an abundant bliss.[6]

This[7] has come well & not gone away,
it was not badly thought through for me.
From among well-analyzed qualities,
I have obtained
the best.

This has come well & not gone away,
it was not badly thought through for me.
The three knowledges
have been attained;
the Awakened One's bidding,
done.[8]

Where once I stayed here & there with shuddering mind—
    in the wilderness,
    at the foot of a tree,
    in mountains,
    caves—
with ease I now lie down, I stand, with ease I live my life.

O, the Teacher has shown me sympathy!

Before, I was of brahman stock, on either side high-born.
Today I'm the son
of the One Well-Gone,
the Dhamma-king,
the Teacher.

Rid of craving, devoid of clinging,
sense-doors guarded, well-restrained, having killed the root of evil,
I've reached the end of the effluents.

The Teacher has been served by me;
the Awakened One's bidding,
done;
the guide to becoming, uprooted;
the heavy load, laid down.

4. This verse illustrates the kammic principle stated in AN 3:101. This is one of the ways in which the Buddhist doctrine of kamma differed from that of the Jains. For them, a person could not reach arahantship without having suffered retribution for every kammic misdeed, a process that could take many lifetimes —in the course of which, one might create more bad kamma, delaying arahantship still further. But for the Buddhists, training in virtue, discernment, and the ability not to be overcome by pleasure or pain could take the mind to a state where the results of past bad kamma would "be experienced in the here-and-now, and for the most part would appear only for a moment." In other words, in the Buddhist teaching, but not in the Jain, the state of the mind in the present plays a major role in how the effects of past kamma will be experienced.

5. This verse = Dhp 26.

6. This verse = Dhp 27. For a detailed discussion of "intimacy," see SN 22:3.

7. "This" apparently refers to the abundant bliss mentioned in the previous verse.

8. The verses in MN 86 end here.

Thag 17:2 Sāriputta

This is not a single, unified poem. Instead, it is a compilation of verses that—apparently over the course of many years—became associated with Ven. Sāriputta's name. Some of them may have been his original compositions. Others are verses that other people spoke about him. One in particular is also found in Ud 3:4, where the Buddha is said to have exclaimed it on seeing Sāriputta meditating. Some of the verses that make no mention of Sāriputta are, in other parts of the Canon, attributed to the Buddha, suggesting that they might have been those that Sāriputta's liked to repeat.

One of the verses, toward the end of the collection, makes reference to the perfection of discernment. The teaching on the perfections is elsewhere found only in later additions to the Canon, suggesting that this compilation as a whole was also late. This, however, does not rule out the possibility that some of the individual verses were early.

Also, it should be noted that a large number of the verses here are also found in Thag 14:1. This pattern of borrowing that occurs from one poem to another is a common occurrence in the Theragāthā, suggesting that the compilers of the collection felt no qualms about standardizing the sentiments of the great elders.

Mindful, heedful,
his mind well-centered, absorbed with restrained resolves,[1] inwardly delighting
in his conduct, his mindfulness, alone, content:
    He's called a monk.

Eating moist or dry food,
he shouldn't be heavily sated.
With unfilled belly, with measured food, the monk should wander
    mindfully.

Leaving four or five mouthfuls uneaten,
he should drink water:
This is enough
for the easeful abiding
of a resolute monk.

And he covers himself with a proper robe enough for that purpose:
This is enough
for the easeful abiding
of a resolute monk.

As he sits cross-legged,
it doesn't rain on his knees:
This is enough
for the easeful abiding
of a resolute monk.

Whoever sees pleasure as pain,
and pain as an arrow,
and that there's nothing between the two:
With what will he be what in the world?

"May I never have anything to do with a person of evil desires, lazy, lowly in his persistence, with little learning, disrespectful":
With what will he be what in the world?

But one who is learned, wise,
well-centered in virtues, devoted to tranquility of awareness:
Let him stand at the head.

One who is devoted to objectification,[2] his heart delighting in objectification, attains no unbinding,
the unexcelled rest from the yoke.

But whoever, abandoning objectification, delighting in the path of non-objectification,

attains unbinding,
the unexcelled rest from the yoke.

In village or wilds,
valley, plateau:
that place is delightful
where arahants dwell.

Delightful wilds
where the crowds don't delight,
those free from passion
    delight,
for they're not searching
for sensual pleasures.[3]

Regard him as one who points out
    treasure,
the wise one who
seeing your faults
    rebukes you.
Stay with this sort of sage.
For the one who stays
with a sage of this sort,
    things get better,
    not worse.

Let him admonish, instruct,
    deflect you
away from poor manners.
To the good, he's endearing;
to the bad, he's not.[4]

He, the Blessed One, the One Awakened, the One with Eyes, was teaching Dhamma to another.
And while the Dhamma was being taught,
I, desiring the Dhamma, turned an attentive ear.
My listening was not in vain:

I'm released, effluent-free.[5]

Not for knowledge of previous lifetimes, nor for the divine eye,
nor for knowledge of others' minds,
nor for psychic power,
nor for knowledge of beings dying & being reborn, nor for purifying the divine ear did I have any aspiration.

Sitting at the root of a tree,
with shaven head,
wrapped in an outer robe,
the elder foremost in discernment:
Upatissa does jhāna.[6]

Attaining no-thinking,
the disciple of the Rightly
Self-Awakened One
is endowed with noble silence
straightaway.[7]

As a mountain of rock
is unwavering, well-settled,
so a monk whose delusion is ended
doesn't quiver—
just like a mountain.[8]

To a person without blemish,
in constant quest of what's pure,
a hair-tip of evil
seems a storm cloud.

I don't delight in death,
don't delight in living.
I await my time
like a worker his wage.
I don't delight in death,
don't delight in living.
I await my time,

mindful, alert.

On either side is death,
it's not non-death, ahead or behind.
Practice, don't perish.
Don't let the moment pass you by.

As a frontier fortress is guarded
within & without,
you should safeguard yourselves.
Don't let the moment
pass you by.
Those for whom the moment is past
grieve, consigned to hell.[9]

Calmed, restrained,
giving counsel unruffled,
he shakes off evil qualities—
as the breeze,
a leaf from a tree.[10]

Calmed, restrained,
giving counsel unruffled,
he removed evil qualities—
as the breeze,
a leaf from a tree.

You shouldn't trust in this way some householders or those gone forth.
Having been good, they become bad.
Having been bad, they become good.

Sensual desire, ill will,
sloth & torpor,
restlessness & uncertainty:
These, for a monk, are the five defilements.

The concentration of one dwelling in heedfulness
doesn't waver,
whether he is honored or not.

Doing jhāna, persevering, having subtle insight into subtle views,
delighting in the ending of clinging:
He's called a man of integrity.

The great ocean, the Earth, a mountain, even the wind aren't fitting as a comparison for the Teacher's foremost release.

Keeping the (Dhamma) wheel going,
the elder of great knowledge, centered, being like earth, fire, & water, is neither impassioned nor angered.[11]

Having attained perfection in discernment,[12] greatly intelligent, a great sage, not dull, though seemingly dull,
he always wanders unbound.

The Teacher has been served by me;
the Awakened One's bidding,
done;
the heavy load, laid down;
the guide to becoming, uprooted.

Attain consummation
through heedfulness:
That is my message.
So then, I'm about to
unbind.
I'm released
everywhere.[13]

Thag 18 Mahā Kassapa

One shouldn't go about surrounded, revered
by a company:
        One gets distracted;
        concentration
        is hard to gain.
Fellowship with many people
                is painful.
Seeing this,
        one shouldn't approve of a company.

A sage shouldn't visit families:
        one gets distracted;
        concentration
        is hard to gain.
He's eager & greedy for flavors,
        whoever misses the goal
        that brings bliss.
They know it's a bog—
        the reverence & veneration of families—
a subtle arrow, hard to extract.
Offerings are hard for a worthless man to let go.

* * *

Coming down from my dwelling place,
I entered the city for alms, stood courteously next to a leper eating his meal.

He, with his rotting hand,

tossed me a morsel of food, and as the morsel was dropping, a finger fell off
        right there.

Sitting next to a wall,
I ate that morsel of food,
and neither while eating it, nor having eaten,
did I feel any disgust.[1]

Whoever has mastered
        left-over scraps for food, smelly urine for medicine,
        the foot of a tree for a dwelling,
        cast-off rags for robes:
He is a man
of the four directions.

Where some are exhausted climbing the mountain,
there[2]
the Awakened One's heir
        —mindful, alert,
        buoyed by his psychic power—Kassapa climbs.

Returning from his alms round,
climbing the peak,
Kassapa does jhāna
with no clinging,
        having abandoned terror & fear.

Returning from his alms round,
climbing the peak,
Kassapa does jhāna
with no clinging,

unbound
among those who burn.

Returning from his alms round,
climbing the peak,
Kassapa does jhāna
with no clinging,
effluent-free,
his task done.

Spread with garlands of vines, places delighting the mind, resounding with elephants,
appealing:
Those rocky crags
refresh me.

The color of blue-dark clouds,
glistening,
cooled with the waters
of clear-flowing streams
covered with ladybugs:
Those rocky crags
refresh me.

Like the peaks of blue-dark clouds, like excellent peaked-roof buildings, resounding with tuskers,
appealing:
Those rocky crags
refresh me.

Their lovely surfaces wet with rain, mountains frequented
by seers & echoing with peacocks:
Those rocky crags
refresh me.

This is enough for me—

desiring to do jhāna,
resolute, mindful;
enough for me—
desiring the goal,
resolute,
a monk;
enough for me—
desiring comfort,
resolute,
trained;[3]
enough for me—
desiring my duty,
resolute,
Such.

Flax-flower blue,
like the sky
covered over with clouds;
filled with flocks
of various birds:
Those rocky crags
refresh me.

Uncrowded
by householders,
frequented
by herds of deer
filled with flocks
of various birds:
Those rocky crags
refresh me.

With clear waters &
massive boulders,
frequented by monkeys &
deer,
covered with moss &
water weeds:
Those rocky crags

refresh me.

There is no such pleasure for me in the music of a five-piece band as there is when my mind is at one,
seeing the Dhamma
                aright.

* * *

One shouldn't do lots of work, should avoid people,
shouldn't busy oneself.
He's eager & greedy for flavors,
        whoever misses the goal
        that brings bliss.

One shouldn't do lots of work, should avoid
what doesn't lead to the goal.
The body gets wearied,
fatigued.
Aching, one finds
no tranquility.

* * *

Simply by flapping the mouth one doesn't see
even oneself.
One goes around stiff-necked,
thinking, 'I'm better than they.'

Not better,
he thinks himself better,
        the fool:
The wise don't praise him,
the stiff-necked man.

But whoever isn't stirred by the modes of

        'I'm better,
        not better.
        I'm worse.
        I'm like that';
one who's discerning,
who acts as he says,
well-centered
in virtues,
committed to tranquility of awareness, he is the one
        the wise
                would praise.

One with no respect
for his fellows in the holy life, is as far
                from true Dhamma
as the earth
                from the sky.

But those whose sense of shame & compunction are always rightly established: They have flourished in the holy life.
        For them
there's no further becoming.

A monk conceited & vain, even though clad
in a robe of cast-off rags, like a monkey in a lion's skin, doesn't shine because of it.

But a monk not conceited or vain,
        masterful,
his faculties restrained, shines

because of his robe of cast-off rags, like a lion
in the cleft of a mountain.

These many devas,
powerful, prestigious
—10,000 devas—
all of Brahmā's retinue, stand with their hands over their hearts, paying homage to Sāriputta, the Dhamma-general,
enlightened,[4]
centered,
great master of jhāna, [saying:]

'Homage to you, O thoroughbred man.
Homage to you, O superlative man—
of whom we have no direct knowledge even of that
in dependence on which
you do jhāna.

'How very amazing:
the awakened ones'
very own deep range—
of which we have no direct knowledge, though we have come as hair-splitting archers.'
Seeing Sāriputta,
a man worthy of worship,
worshipped by deva retinues, Kappina
smiled.[5]

* * *

As far as this buddha-field[6] extends —except for the great sage himself—

I'm the one outstanding
in ascetic qualities.
There's no one else
like me.

The Teacher has been served by me;
the Awakened One's bidding,
done;
the heavy load, laid down;
the guide to becoming, uprooted.

Neither to robe,
nor dwelling,
nor food
does he cling:
Gotama,
like a lotus unspotted
by water, inclining to renunciation, detached from the three planes of becoming.[7]

He,
the great sage,
has the establishings of mindfulness
as his neck, conviction
as hands,
discernment
as head.[8]
Having great knowledge, he goes about
always unbound.

Notes

1. This passage has often been misread as saying that the leper's finger fell into Mahā Kassapa's bowl, and that Mahā Kassapa actually ate the finger. Nothing in the verse, though, indicates that this is so. It simply says that the finger fell off, and that Mahā Kassapa ate the food. Furthermore, there is a rule in the Mahāvagga—Mv.VI.23.9—that imposes a grave offense on any monk who eats human flesh. So it's highly unlikely that Mahā Kassapa ate the leper's finger.

2. Reading tattha with the Thai and Sinhalese editions.

3. Reading sikkhato with the Thai edition.

4. Reading dhīraṁ with the Thai and PTS editions. The Burmese and Sinhalese editions read vīraṁ, "hero."

5. Ven. Sāriputta was foremost among the monks in terms of discernment (AN 1:183); Ven. Kappina, foremost among the monks in exhorting other monks (AN 1:231). The Buddha praises him at SN 21:11 for his attainment of psychic powers, and at SN 54:7 for the solidity of his concentration based on mindfulness of breathing.

6. This appears to be one of the earliest references to "buddha-field," a concept that was to play a large role in the Apadāna literature and, through that, in the Mahāyāna concept of the Pure Land. Here it appears to mean the sphere of the current Buddha's influence. In the Apadānas it takes on two other meanings: as (1) a field for producing merit, on the lines of the traditional image of the Saṅgha as the unexcelled field of merit; and (2) a heavenly realm where a particular Buddha dwells. These two meanings were influential in the early Mahāyāna sūtras that formed the basis for Pure Land practice.

7. The three planes of becoming are the sensual, form, and formlessness. See AN 3:77–78.

Therīgāthā

Poems of the Elder Nuns

Thig 1:1 An Anonymous Nun

Sleep, little therī, sleep comfortably, wrapped in the robe you've made,
for your passion is stilled—like a pot of pickled greens boiled dry.

Thig 1:3 Puṇṇā

Puṇṇā, grow full with good qualities like the moon on the fifteenth day.
With discernment at total fullness, burst the mass
    of darkness.

Thig 1:11 Muttā

So freed! So thoroughly freed am I!— from three crooked things set free:
    from mortar, pestle, & crooked old husband.
Having uprooted the craving that leads to becoming,
I'm from aging & death set free.

See also: Thag 1:43; Thag 2:9

Thig 1:17 Dhammā

Wandering for alms—weak, leaning on a staff,[1] with trembling limbs—
I fell down right there on the ground.

Seeing the drawbacks of the body, my mind was then
set free.

Note

1. Reading daṇḍamolubbha with the Burmese, Sinhalese, and PTS editions. The Thai edition has daṇḍamādāya, "holding a staff."

Thig 2:3 Sumaṅgala's Mother

So freed! So freed!
So thoroughly freed am I—
    from my pestle,
    my shameless husband & his sun-shade making, my moldy old pot
    with its water-snake smell.
Aversion & passion
I cut with a chop.
Having come to the foot of a tree,
I do jhāna, from the bliss thinking:
    "What bliss!"

See also: Thag 1:43

Thig 2:4 Aḍḍhkāsī

All of the Kāsi countryside:
My fee was equal to that.
Having made that my price,
the town[1] set me as priceless in price.
But then I became disenchanted with my body, and—disenchanted—dispassionate:
"May I not run again & again through birth & the wandering-on."
The three knowledges
have been realized.
The Buddha's bidding
done.

Note

1. Reading nigamo with the Thai edition. The Burmese and Sinhalese editions read negamo, "the townspeople."

Thig 3:2 Uttamā

Four times, five, I ran amok from my dwelling,
having gained no peace of awareness,
my thoughts out of control.
So I went to a trustworthy nun.
She taught me the Dhamma:
aggregates, sense media, properties.[1]
Hearing the Dhamma,
I did as she said.
For seven days I sat in one spot, absorbed in rapture & bliss.
On the eighth, I stretched out my legs, having burst the mass
of darkness.

Note

1. On the aggregates (khandha), see SN 22:59 and SN 22:79; on the sense media (āyatana), SN 35:28; on the properties (dhātu), MN 140. On the relationships among these frameworks for analyzing experience, see MN 28.

Thig 3:4 Dantikā & the Elephant

Coming out from my day's abiding on Vulture Peak Mountain, I saw on the bank of the river an elephant emerged from its plunge.

A man holding a hook requested:
                "Give me your foot."
The elephant
    extended its foot.
The man
    got up on the elephant.

Seeing what was untrained now tamed brought under human control, with that I centered my mind—why I'd gone to the woods in the first place.

Thig 3:5 Ubbiri

[Ubbiri recalls the Buddha's words:]

"'Jīva, my daughter,'
you cry in the woods.
Come to your senses, Ubbiri.
        84,000
    all named Jīva
have been burned in that charnel ground.
For which of them do you grieve?"

Pulling out
    —completely out—
the arrow so hard to see,
embedded in my heart,
he expelled from me
    —overcome with grief—
the grief
over my daughter.

Today—with arrow removed,
    without hunger, entirely
        unbound—
to the Buddha, Dhamma, & Saṅgha I go,
    for refuge to
    the Sage.

Thig 5:2 Vimalā, the Former Courtesan

Intoxicated with my complexion figure, beauty, & fame;
haughty with youth,
        I despised other women.
Adorning this body
embellished to delude foolish men, I stood at the door to the brothel:
        a hunter with snare laid out.
I showed off my ornaments, and revealed many a private part.
I worked my manifold magic,
laughing out loud at the crowd.

Today, wrapped in a double cloak,
    my head shaven,
    having wandered for alms,
I sit at the foot of a tree
and attain the state of no-thought.
All ties—human & divine—have been cut.
Having cast off all
effluents,
cooled am I. Unbound.

See also: AN 7:48; Thag 6:9

Thig 5:4 Nandā's Vision

"Sick, putrid, unclean:
look, Nandā, at this physical heap.
Through contemplation of the foul,
develop your mind,
make it one, well-centered.

        As this [your body], so that.
        As that, so this.
It gives off a foul stench, the delight of fools."
Considering it thus,
untiring, both day & night,
I, with my own discernment dissecting it, saw.

And as I, heedful,
        examined it aptly,
this body—as it actually is—
was seen inside & out.

Then was I disenchanted with the body & dispassionate within:
Heedful, detached,
        calmed was I.

                Unbound.

Thig 5:6 Mittakālī

Going forth through conviction
from home into homelessness,
I wandered this place & that,
greedy for tribute & gains.
Missing out on the foremost goal,
I pursued a lowly one.
Under the sway of defilements,
I didn't awaken[1] to the goal of the contemplative life.

Then, sitting in my dwelling,
I suddenly came to my senses:

I'm following a miserable path.
I'm under the sway of
craving.
Next to nothing, my life,
crushed
by aging & illness.
Before the body breaks apart,
I have no time
for heedlessness.

After watching, as it actually was,
the arising-disbanding of aggregates,
I stood up with mind released,
the Awakened One's bidding
done.

Thig 5:8 Soṇā, Mother of Ten

Ten children I bore
from this physical heap.
Then weak from that, aged,
I went to a nun.
She taught me the Dhamma:
    aggregates, sense media, & properties.
Hearing her Dhamma,
I cut off my hair & ordained.
Having purified the divine eye while still a trainee,[1]
I know my previous lives, where I lived in the past.
I develop the theme-less meditation, well-focused oneness.
I gain the liberation of immediacy[2]—
from lack of clinging, unbound.
The five aggregates, comprehended, stand like a tree with its root cut through.
    I spit on wretched birth[3]
                old age.
There is now no further becoming.

Notes

1. Sikkhamānā: A candidate for full ordination as a nun first had to undergo a two-year period as a trainee, in which she undertook the ten precepts of a novice and had to observe the first six without break. If she broke any of those six, she had to go back and start the two-year period again.

2. This is apparently equivalent to the concentration of unmediated knowing, mentioned in Sn 2:1, and the concentration that is the fruit of gnosis, mentioned in AN 9:37.

3. This line plays with the word jamme, which can mean either “wretched” or “birth.”

Thig 5:10 Paṭācārā

[I thought:]

"Plowing the field with plows, sowing the ground with seed,
supporting their wives & children,
young men gather up wealth.

So why is it that I,
        consummate in virtue,
        a doer of the teacher's bidding,
don't gain unbinding?
I'm not lazy or proud."
Washing my feet, I noticed the water.

And in watching it flow from high
                to low,
        my heart was composed
        like a fine thoroughbred steed.

Then taking a lamp, I entered the hut, checked the bedding,
        sat down on the bed.

And taking a pin, I pulled out the wick:
        Like the flame's[1] unbinding was the liberation of awareness.

Thig 5:11 Paṭācārā's Thirty Students

[Paṭācārā taught:]

"Taking the pestle,
young men grind the corn.
Supporting their wives & children,
they gather up wealth.
Do the Awakened One's bidding, which, having done,
    you'll have no regret.
Intent on tranquility of awareness,
do the Awakened One's bidding.
Quickly:
    Having washed your feet,
    go sit to one side."

Hearing these words,
Paṭācārā's bidding,
they washed their feet
and retired to one side.
Intent on tranquility of awareness,
they did the Awakened One's bidding.
In the first watch of the night,
    they recollected their previous lives.
In the middle watch,
    purified the divine eye.
In the last,
    burst the mass of darkness.
Getting up, they bowed down to her feet.

"We have done your bidding.
Like the thirty devas honoring Indra, unvanquished in battle, we—

endowed with the three knowledges,
effluent-free—
will continue honoring you."

Thig 5:12 Candā, the Beggar

Before, I had fallen on evil times:
    no husband, no children,
    no relatives, friends,
    no way to obtain clothing & food.
So, taking a staff & bowl in hand, begging for alms from house to house, feverish from the cold & heat,
I wandered for seven full years.
Then seeing a nun
obtaining food & drink,
I approached her & said:
    "Let me go forth
    into homelessness."

She, Paṭācārā, from sympathy,
let me go forth;
then, exhorting me,
urged me on to the highest goal.
Hearing her words,
I did her bidding.
Her exhortation was not in vain.
    Endowed with the three knowledges,
    I'm effluent- free.

Thig 6:1 Paṭācārā's 500 Students

[Paṭācārā recounts the Buddha's words:]

"You don't know
the path
of his coming or going,
that being who has come from where?—
the one you lament as 'my son.'

But when you know
the path
of his coming or going,
you don't grieve after him,
for that is the nature of beings.

Unasked,
he came from there.
Without permission,
he went from here
—coming from where?—
having stayed a few days.
And coming one way from here,
he goes yet another
from there.
Dying in the human form,
he will go wandering on.
As he came, so he has gone—so what is there to lament?"

Pulling out
—completely out—
the arrow so hard to see,

embedded in my heart,
he [the Buddha] expelled from me —overcome with grief—
the grief
over my son.

Today—with arrow removed,
without hunger, entirely
unbound—
to the Buddha, Dhamma, & Saṅgha I go,
for refuge to
the Sage.

Thig 6:2 Vāsiṭṭhī the Madwoman

Overwhelmed with grief for my son—naked, demented,
my hair disheveled
my mind deranged—
I went about here & there,[1] living along the side of the road, in cemeteries & heaps of trash,
for three full years,
afflicted with hunger & thirst.

Then I saw
the One Well-Gone,
gone to the city of Mithilā:
tamer of those untamed,
Self-Awakened,
with nothing to fear
from anything, anywhere.

Regaining my mind,
paying him homage,
I sat myself down.
He, Gotama, from sympathy
taught me the Dhamma.
Hearing his Dhamma,
I went forth into homelessness.
Applying myself to the Teacher's words,
I realized the state of auspicious bliss.

All griefs have been cut off,
abandoned,
brought to this end,
for I've comprehended
the grounds from which griefs come into play.

Thig 6:3 Khemā

In SN 5:4, a variation of the verse attributed to Māra, and the first verse attributed here to Sister Khemā, are included in a poem attributed to Sister Vijayā (see Thig 6:8). Sister Khema's second verse is attributed to Sister Aḷavikā in SN 5:1. Her third verse also appears in Thig 7:2; its first half, in SN 5:3.

Māra:

"You, a beautiful young woman;
I, a young man, full of youth.
Come, Khemā,
let's enjoy ourselves
        to the music of a five-piece band."

Khemā:

"I'm disgusted, ashamed of this putrid body—
disintegrating, dissolving.
        Sensual craving
                is rooted out.

Sensual pleasures
        are like swords & spears;
the aggregates,
        their executioner's block.
What you call sensual delight is no delight for me.

Everywhere enjoyment
        is defeated;
the mass of darkness,
        burst.
So know, Evil One,
that you have been,
                End-maker,

struck down."

* * *

Paying homage to the zodiac stars, tending the fire in the forest, not knowing it as it actually was,
    fools, you conceived it as purity.
Whereas I am one who pays homage
    to the One Self-awakened,
    the utmost man.
I'm one who has done the Teacher's bidding, entirely released
from sufferings & stress.

Thig 6:4 Sujātā

Ornamented, well-dressed, garlanded, sprinkled with sandalwood, covered all over with jewelry, surrounded by a group of slave-women,
taking food & drink,
and not a little staple & non-staple food,
        leaving the house,
I fetched myself to the pleasure garden.

Having enjoyed ourselves & played there, we headed back to our home.
I saw in Sāketa a hall at the Añjana wood.
        I entered.
Seeing the light of the world,
I, paying homage, sat nearby.
He, the One with Eyes,[1]
from sympathy,
taught me the Dhamma.
Hearing the Great Seer, I fully penetrated
        the truth.
Right there I touched the Dhamma, dustless, the deathless state.
Then, knowing the True Dhamma,
        I went forth
        into homelessness.
                The three knowledges
                are attained.
        The Buddha's bidding
        is not in vain.

Note

1. Since Vedic times, there has been a belief in India that the eyes of holy individuals where particularly powerful because they could see so deeply into reality. From this belief grew a further belief: that the eyes of such individuals were so powerful that their eyes could transmit some of that power to others. Thus, to be gazed on by such an individual, or to gaze into that individual's eyes, was considered to be very auspicious. Sujātā's reference to the Buddha as "the One with Eyes" carries all of these connotations. For more on this topic, see Sn 5:5 and DN 16, note 44.

Thig 6:5 Anopamā, the Millionaire's Daughter

Born in a high-ranking family with much property, great wealth, consummate in complexion & figure,
I was the daughter of Majjha, the treasurer.
Kings' sons sought for me, rich merchants' sons
    longed for me.
One of them sent my father a messenger, saying, "Give me Anopamā.
I will give in return eight times her weight in jewels & gold."

But I, having seen
    the One Self-awakened, unsurpassed, excelling the world,
paid homage to his feet,
sat down to one side.
He, Gotama, from sympathy,
taught me the Dhamma.
And as I sat in that very seat,
    I attained the third fruit [of non-return.]
Then I cut off my hair, and went forth into homelessness.
Today is the seventh day since I made craving wither away.

Thig 6:6 Mahāpajāpatī Gotamī

Awakened! Hero! Homage to you, highest of all beings—
you who've released me
and many other people
from suffering!
I've comprehended all stress, dried up craving, the cause, developed the eightfold path,[1] and touched cessation.

Before I was mother, son, father, brother,
  grandmother.
Not knowing things as they were,
I wandered on without respite.
But now that I've seen the Blessed One,
this is my last body-heap.
Birth & wandering-on
  are totally ended.
There is now
  no further becoming.

I see the disciples gathered,
their persistence aroused,
resolute, constant
in strong exertion:
  This is the worship of the Buddhas.[2]

Truly for the benefit of the many did Māyā[3] give birth to Gotama, thrusting away the mass of pain of those mired in illness & death.

Thig 6:7 Guttā

[The Buddha admonished me:]
Guttā, devote yourself to the goal for which you went forth, having discarded [hope] for a dear son of your own.[1] Don't fall under the sway of the mind.

Hoodwinked by mind,
beings in love with Māra's realm, roam
through the many-birth wandering-on,
        unknowing.

Abandoning these lower fetters, nun—
    sensual desire, ill will,
    self-identity views,
    grasping at habits & practices, and uncertainty as the fifth—you won't come to this again.

Forsaking passion, conceit, ignorance, & restlessness —cutting through [all] the fetters—
    you will make an end
of suffering & stress.

Discarding birth & wandering-on,
comprehending further becoming,
    free from hunger
in the right-here-&-now you will go about

totally calmed.

Thig 6:8 Vijayā

Four times, five, I ran amok from my dwelling,
having gained no peace of awareness,
my thoughts out of control.
So, approaching a nun,
I cross-questioned her attentively.
She taught me the Dhamma:
aggregates, sense media, properties,
four noble truths,
five faculties,
seven factors for awakening, the eightfold path
for attaining the highest goal.
Hearing her words,
I did her bidding.
In the first watch of the night,
I remembered past lives.
In the second watch of the night,
I purified the divine eye.
In the third watch of the night,
I burst the mass of darkness.
Then I stayed, suffusing[1] my body with rapture & pleasure.
On the seventh day, I stretched out my legs, having burst the mass
of darkness.

Thig 7:2 Cālā

In SN 5:8, verses similar to these are attributed to the nun Sīsūpacālā.

Cālā:

Having established mindfulness,
a nun with developed faculties,[1] I penetrated the peaceful state:
    stilling-of-fabrications bliss.[2]

Māra:

"For whose sake
    have you shaved your head?
You look like a contemplative but don't approve of a philosophy, so why are you wandering here confused?"

Cālā:

"Outside philosophers place their confidence in views.
They don't know the Dhamma.[3] They're not adept in the Dhamma.
    But there is
the Awakened One,
born in the Sakyan clan,
a person without peer.[4]
He taught me the Dhamma
for the transcending of views:
    stress,
    the co-arising of stress,
    the overcoming of stress,
    & the noble eightfold path leading to the stilling of stress.[5]

Having heard his words,
I dwell, delighting
in his bidding.

The three knowledges
are attained;
the Buddha's bidding,
done.
Everywhere enjoyment

the mass of darkness,
burst.
So know, Evil One,
that you have been,
End-maker,
struck down.

3. In SN 5:8, this line reads, "I don't approve of their teaching."

4. This is the last line that this poem has in common with SN 5:8. The remainder of SN 5:8 reads:

all-conquering,

everywhere undefeated,
everywhere freed, independent;
endowed with an Eye
all-seeing, reaching the end of
all kamma—
with the ending of acquisitions,
released.

Thig 7:3 Upacālā

In SN 5:6, verses similar to these are attributed to the nun Cālā.

Upacālā:

Having mindfulness, having an eye that sees,
a nun with developed faculties, I penetrated the peaceful state of which worthless people don't partake.[1]

Māra:

Why don't you approve of birth?
One who is born
enjoys sensual pleasures.
Enjoy sensual delight!
Don't later burn with regret.

Upacālā:

For one who is born
there's death,[2]
the cutting-off of hands & feet, binding, flogging, torment.
One who's born incurs pain.
But there is
the Rightly Awakened One,
the undefeated one,
born in the Sakyan clan.
He taught me the Dhamma
for the transcending of birth:
stress,
the co-arising of stress,
the overcoming of stress,
& the noble eightfold path

2. This is the last line that this poem has in common with SN 5:6. The remainder of SN 5:6 reads:

One who is born
sees pain.
It's a binding, a flogging, a torment.
That's why one shouldn't approve
of birth.

The Awakened One taught me the Dhamma
—the overcoming of birth—for the abandoning of all pain, he established me in
the truth.
But beings who have come to form & those with a share in the formless, if they don't discern cessation,
return to becoming-again.

Thig 8 Sīsūpacālā

In SN 5:7, verses similar to these are attributed to the nun Upacālā.

Sīsūpacālā:

A nun, consummate in virtue,
her faculties well-restrained, will reach the state of peace,
a nourishment
that never cloys.[1]

Māra:

The Devas of the Thirty-three,
the Hours, the Contented,
devas who delight in creation, & devas in control:
Direct your mind there
where you lived before.[2]

Sīsūpacālā:

The Devas of the Thirty-three,
the Hours, the Contented,
devas who delight in creation, & devas in control:
Time & again,
from becoming to becoming,
surrounded by self-identity,
not having gone beyond self-identity, they flow to birth & death.[3]

The whole world is burning.
The whole world is aflame.
The whole world is blazing.
The whole world is shaken.[4]

The unshaken, incomparable
—the Dhamma the Buddha taught to me,
of which people run-of-the-mill
    don't partake—
that's where my heart
    truly delights.
Having heard his words,
I dwell, delighting
in his bidding.

The three knowledges
        are attained;
the Buddha's bidding,
        done.

    & devas in control:
            Direct your mind there
            and it will enjoy
                delight.

3. The parallel stanza in SN 5:7 reads:

    The Devas of the Thirty-three,
    the Hours, the Contented,

devas who delight in creation, & devas in control:
They are bound
with the bonds of sensuality;
they come again
under Māra's sway.

4. This is the last line that this poem has in common with SN 5:7. The remainder of SN 5:7 reads:

The unshaken, untrembling
—of which people run-of-the-mill

never been—that's where my heart
truly delights.

Thig 9 Vaḍḍha's Mother

Vaḍḍha's Mother:

Vaḍḍha, don't have any underbrush-lust
ever, in the world, at all.
Don't, my little son,
have a share in suffering
        again & again.
For happy are sages, Vaḍḍha, unperturbed, with doubt cut through.
Having become cool and self-controlled, they dwell effluent-free.
Foster the path,
pursued by seers,
for the attainment of vision,
for the ending of stress.

Vaḍḍha:

Undaunted, mother,
you speak this matter to me.
I suspect that now in you no underbrush
    is found.

Vaḍḍha's Mother:

Whatever fabrications are lowly, middling, or exalted:
No underbrush for them in me —not a bit, not the least little bit—
        is found.
All effluents are ended for me—heedful, doing jhāna.
The three knowledges

are attained;
the Buddha's bidding,
done.

Vaḍḍha:

With what a vast goad
my mother poked me—
because of her sympathy—verses connected to the ultimate goal.
Having heard her words—my mother's instruction—Dhamma-saṁvega arose
for attaining rest from the yoke.
Resolute in exertion,
relentlessly, both day & night,
I, roused by my mother,
touched
the highest peace.

Thig 10 Kīsā Gotamī

Kīsā Gotamī has two of the most heart-rending stories in the Buddhist tradition associated with her name. The Commentary to this verse tells that when her young child had died, she refused to believe it was dead. After asking many people—in vain—for medicine that would revive the child, she was finally directed to the Buddha. When she told him her story, he offered to provide medicine for the child, but he would need some mustard seed—the cheapest Indian spice—obtained from a family in which no one had died. She went from house to house asking for mustard seed, and no one refused to give it to her. But when she asked if anyone had died in the family, the universal response was always, "Oh, yes, of course." After a while, the message sunk in: Death is universal. On abandoning the child's body to a charnel ground, she returned to the Buddha and asked to be ordained as a nun, and afterwards became an arahant.

The canonical verses associated with Kīsā Gotamī's name, however, tell a different story, which is identical to the story that the Commentary attributes to Paṭācārā: Pregnant with her second child, she was returning to her parents' home, along with her husband and young firstborn child, to give birth. Along the way, a great storm blew up, and she asked her husband to provide shelter for the family. As he was cutting grass and gathering sticks to build a shelter, a snake bit him and he died of the poison. Unsheltered, and wondering at her husband's long absence, Paṭācārā gave birth and had to spend the night sheltering both her children against the rain and wind with nothing more than her body. The next morning, she found her husband dead. Distraught, she decided to return to her parents' home. However, a river—swollen from the rain of the previous night—ran across her way. Unable to carry both children across the river in one trip, she left her first-born on the near bank and waded through the raging current carrying her baby. Placing the baby on the far bank, she turned back to fetch her first-born. A hawk, seeing the baby, took it for a piece of flesh, and swooped down on it. Seeing this, Paṭācārā raised her hands and tried to chase it away, but to no avail: The hawk picked up the baby and carried it off. Meanwhile, her first-born—seeing his mother raising her hands—took it for a signal to cross the river. Jumping into the raging current, he was carried off to his death. Overwhelmed with grief, Paṭācārā returned to her parents' home, only to learn that it had burned down from a lightning strike in the previous night's storm. Her parents and brother were at that moment being cremated on a single pyre. At this point, she went mad and began wandering around half-naked. Only on coming into the Buddha's presence did she recover her senses. He taught her the Dhamma, and eventually she ordained and became an arahant.

Why this story is attributed to Paṭācārā in the Commentary when it is obviously Kīsā Gotamī's in the Canon, is hard to tell. Some scholars have suggested that the tales in the Pāli commentaries were imported from other Buddhist traditions, such as the Mūlasarvāstivādin. Thus, the differences between the canonical verses and the commentarial tales stem from the fact that the different traditions attributed particular stories to different elder monks and nuns. For instance, the Pali Canon attributed the story of the woman whose family was destroyed in a single day to Kīsā Gotamī, while the tradition from which the Commentary drew attributed it to Paṭācārā. If that's the case, it's interesting to note how the commentators who adopted these tales nevertheless remained faithful to their Canon. Instead of trying to change the Pali to fit with the commentarial source on which they drew, they allowed the discrepancies between the two sources to stand: one of many instances in which the discrepancies between the Canon and the commentaries suggest that the monks who handed down the Pali Canon tried to keep it intact even when they didn't agree with it.

Later Theravādin texts have tried to cover over the discrepancies between Kīsā Gotamī's verses and the Commentary to those verses by insisting that the passage in the verses beginning, "Going along, about to give birth," and ending, "my husband dead, I reached the deathless," is actually Paṭācārā speaking, but this seems unlikely: Why would one arahant butt in on another one's tale?

At any rate, regardless of which story is Paṭācārā's, and which Kīsā Gotamī's, both speak to the universality of death, and the power of the path of practice: that in the midst of this human world with all its sorrows, there is still a way to find that which is free from grieving, aging, and illness: the deathless.

> Having admirable friends > has been praised by the Sage > with reference to the world.

Associating with an admirable friend even a fool becomes wise.
People of integrity
should be associated with.
In that way discernment grows.
Associating with people of integrity one would be released from all suffering & stress, would know stress,
the origination of stress,
cessation & the eightfold path:
    the four noble truths.

Stressful, painful, is the woman's state:
    So says the tamer of tamable people.
Being a co-wife is painful.
Some, on giving birth once, slit their throats.
Others, of delicate constitution,
take poison.
In the midst of a breech-birth both [mother & child] suffer destruction.

Going along, about to give birth,
I saw my husband   dead.
Giving birth in the road,
I hadn't reached
my own home.
Two children deceased,
my husband dead in the road
    —miserable me!
My mother, father, & brother were burning on a single pyre.

    "Your family all gone, miserable, you've suffered pain without measure.
    Your tears have flowed for many thousands of lives."[1]

Then I saw,
in the midst of the charnel ground,[2]
the muscles of sons being chewed.

With family killed,
despised by all,
my husband dead,
    I reached the deathless.
I've developed this path,
    noble, eightfold,
    going to the deathless.
Having realized unbinding, I've gazed in the mirror of Dhamma.
I've extracted the arrow,[3]
put down the burden, done the task.

I, Kīsā Gotamī Therī,
my heart well released,
have said this.

Thig 12 Puṇṇikā & the Brahman

Puṇṇikā:

I'm a water-carrier, cold, always going down to the water from fear of my mistresses' beatings, harassed by their anger & words.
But you, brahman,
what do you fear
that you're always going down to the water with shivering limbs, feeling great cold?

The Brahman:

Puṇṇikā, surely you know.
You're asking one doing skillful kamma & warding off evil.
Whoever, young or old, does evil kamma is, through water ablution, from evil kamma set free.

Puṇṇikā:

Who taught you this
—the ignorant to the ignorant—
'One, through water ablution, is from evil kamma set free'?
In that case, they'd all go to heaven:
all the frogs, turtles, serpents,[1] crocodiles, & anything else that lives in the water.
Sheep-butchers, pork-butchers, fishermen, trappers,
thieves, executioners, & any other evil doers,
would, through water ablution, be from evil kamma set free.

If these rivers could carry off the evil kamma you've done in the past, they'd carry off your merit as well, and then you'd be completely deprived.
Whatever it is that you fear,
that you're always going down to the water,
don't do it.
Don't let the cold hurt your skin."

The Brahman:

I've been following the miserable path, good lady, and now you've brought me back to the noble.
I give you this robe for water-ablution.

Puṇṇikā:

Let the robe be yours. I don't need it.
If you're afraid of pain,
if you dislike pain,
then don't do any evil kamma,
in open, in secret.
But if you do or will do any evil kamma,
you'll gain no freedom from pain,
even if you fly up & hurry away.
If you're afraid of pain,
if you dislike pain,
go to the Awakened One for refuge,
go to the Dhamma & Saṅgha.
Take on the precepts:
That will lead to your liberation.[2]

The Brahman:

I go to the Awakened One for refuge;
I go to the Dhamma & Saṅgha.
I take on the precepts:

That will lead to my liberation.[3]

Before, I was a kinsman to Brahmā;
now, truly a brahman.
I'm a three-knowledge man & safe,
consummate in knowledge,
washed clean.

Thig 13:1 Ambapālī

Black was my hair
—the color of bees—& curled at the tips;
        with age, it looked like coarse hemp.
The Truth-speaker's word
                doesn't change.

Fragrant, like a perfumed basket filled with flowers: my coiffure.
        With age it smelled musty, like animal fur.
The Truth-speaker's word
                doesn't change.

Thick & lush, like a well-tended grove, made splendid, the tips elaborate with comb & pin.
        With age, it grew thin & bald here & there.
The Truth-speaker's word
                doesn't change.

Adorned with gold & delicate pins,[1]
it was splendid, ornamented with braids.
        Now, with age,
        that head has gone bald.
The Truth-speaker's word
                doesn't change.

Curved, as if well-drawn by an artist,
my brows were once splendid.
        With age, they droop down in folds.
The Truth-speaker's word

doesn't change.

Radiant, brilliant like jewels, my eyes: elongated, black—deep black.
With age, they're no longer splendid.
The Truth-speaker's word
doesn't change.

Like a delicate peak, my nose was splendid in the prime of my youth.
With age, it's like a long pepper.
The Truth-speaker's word
doesn't change.

Like bracelets—well-fashioned, well-finished—my ears were once splendid.
With age, they droop down in folds.
The Truth-speaker's word
doesn't change.

Like plantain buds in their color, my teeth were once splendid.
With age, they're broken & yellowed.
The Truth-speaker's word
doesn't change.

Like that of a cuckoo in the dense jungle, flitting through deep forest thickets:
sweet was the tone of my voice.
With age, it cracks here & there.
The Truth-speaker's word
doesn't change.

Smooth[2]—like a conch shell well-polished—my neck was once splendid.
With age, it's broken down, bent.
The Truth-speaker's word
doesn't change.

Like rounded door-bars—both of them—my arms were once splendid.

With age, they're like dried up pāṭalī trees.
The Truth-speaker's word
doesn't change.

Adorned with gold & delicate rings,
my hands were once splendid.
With age, they're like onions & tubers.
The Truth-speaker's word
doesn't change.

Swelling, round, firm, & high,
both my breasts were once splendid.
In the drought of old age, they dangle like empty old water bags.[3]
The Truth-speaker's word
doesn't change.

Like a sheet of gold, well-burnished, my body was splendid.
Now it's covered with very fine wrinkles.
The Truth-speaker's word
doesn't change.

Smooth in their lines, like an elephant's trunk, both my thighs were once splendid.
With age, they're like knotted bamboo.
The Truth-speaker's word
doesn't change.

Adorned with gold & delicate anklets, my calves were once splendid.
With age, they're like sesame sticks.
The Truth-speaker's word
doesn't change.

As if they were stuffed with soft cotton, both my feet were once splendid.
With age, they're shriveled & cracked.
The Truth-speaker's word
doesn't change.

Such was this physical heap,
now: decrepit, the home of pains, many pains.
A house with its plaster all fallen off.
The Truth-speaker's word
doesn't change.

Thig 13:2 Rohiṇī

Rohiṇī's father:

You go to sleep saying,
"Contemplatives."
You wake up,
"Contemplatives."
You praise only
contemplatives.
No doubt you will be
a contemplative.

Abundant food & drink
you give to contemplatives.
Now, Rohiṇī, I ask you:
Why do you hold
contemplatives dear?

They don't like to work,
they're lazy,
living off what's given by others,
full of hankerings,
wanting delicious things:
Why do you hold
contemplatives dear?

Rohiṇī:

For a long time, father, you've quizzed me
about contemplatives.
I'll praise to you their discernment,
virtue,
endeavor.

They do like to work,
they're not lazy.
They do the best work:
They abandon passion & anger.
That's why I hold
contemplatives dear.

They rid themselves of the three evil roots,[1] doing pure actions.
All their evil's
abandoned.
That's why I hold
contemplatives dear.

Clean their bodily action, so is their verbal action.
Clean their mental action:
That's why I hold
contemplatives dear.

Spotless, like mother of pearl, pure within & without,
perfect in clear qualities:
That's why I hold
contemplatives dear.

Learned, maintaining the Dhamma,
noble, living the Dhamma,
they teach the goal
& the Dhamma:
That's why I hold
contemplatives dear.

Learned, maintaining the Dhamma,
noble, living the Dhamma,
with unified minds
& mindful:
That's why I hold

contemplatives dear.

Traveling far, mindful,
giving counsel unruffled,
they discern the end
of suffering:
That's why I hold
contemplatives dear.

When they leave any village they don't turn to look back at anything.
How free from concern
they go!
That's why I hold
contemplatives dear.

They don't store in a granary, pot,
or basket.
They hunt [only]
for what's already cooked:
That's why I hold
contemplatives dear.

They take neither silver,
nor gold,
nor money.
They live off whatever is present:
That's why I hold
contemplatives dear.

Having gone forth
from different families & from different countries, still they hold
one another dear:
That's why I hold
contemplatives dear.

Rohiṇī's father:

Rohiṇī, truly for our benefit were you born in our family.
You have conviction
in the Buddha & Dhamma, and strong respect for the Saṅgha.

You truly discern
this field of merit
unexcelled.
These contemplatives will receive our offering, too,
for here we'll set up
our abundant sacrifice.

Rohiṇī:

If you're afraid of pain,
if you dislike pain,
go to the Buddha for refuge,
go to the Dhamma & Saṅgha.
Take on the precepts:
That will lead
to your benefit.

Rohiṇī's father:

I go to the Buddha for refuge;
I go to the Dhamma & Saṅgha.
I take on the precepts:
That will lead
to my benefit.

I'm a three-knowledge man & safe,
consummate in knowledge,

1. The three unskillful roots are greed, aversion, and delusion. See DN 2, MN 9, and AN 3:66.

Thig 13:5 Subhā the Goldsmith's Daughter

"I was a child, with clean clothes, when I first heard the Dhamma.
And within me, heedful,
was a break-through to the truth.
Then I arrived
at an enormous dissatisfaction with all sensuality.
Seeing the danger
    in self-identity,
I longed only
    for renunciation.
Leaving my circle of relatives,
slaves, workers,
prosperous villages & fields, delightful, enticing possessions,
I went forth,
abandoning not-insignificant wealth.

Having gone out through conviction in the well-taught true Dhamma, it wouldn't be proper for me—
    aspiring to nothingness—having cast off gold & silver to take them back.
Gold & silver
    don't buy awakening,
    don't buy peace.
This [gold] isn't proper for contemplatives.
This isn't noble wealth.
    This is greediness, intoxication, delusion, bondage to dust, suspicion, many troubles.

There's no lasting stability here.
It's to this extent that many, many men —heedless, their hearts defiled—opposing one another, create conflicts, murder, bondage, calamity, loss, grief, & lamentation.
Many misfortunes are seen for those head-over-heels in sensuality.
    So, my relatives:
    Why do you, like enemies,
    try to bind me to sensuality?
You know I've gone forth,
seeing the danger in sensuality.
Gold coin & bullion
can't put an end to effluents.
Sensuality is an enemy,
a murderer,
hostile, arrows & bonds.
    So, my relatives:
    Why do you, like enemies,
    try to bind me to sensuality?
You know I've gone forth
with shaven head, wrapped in a patchwork cloak.
Leftover alms-scraps, gleanings,
a robe made from cast-off cloth:
    That's what's proper for me—
    the requisites of one with no home.
The great seers have rejected sensuality, both human & divine.
Released are they,
                in the place of security.
Arrived are they,
                in unshaken ease.

So may I not come into union with sensuality, in which no shelter is found.

It's an enemy, a murderer
    —sensuality—
painful, like a mass of flame.
    Greed:
an obstacle,[1] fearful, threatened,
full of thorns,
very discordant,
a great cause of delusion.
    Sensuality:
a frightening attack,
like a snake's head
in which fools delight—blinded, run-of-the-mill.

Because many people in the world are stuck in the mud of sensuality,
    unknowing,
they don't realize the ending of birth & death.
Many people follow the path to bad destinations
because of sensuality, bringing disease on themselves.

Thus sensuality creates enemies.
It burns, is defiled.
It's the bait of the world, constraining, the bondage of death, maddening, deceptive, agitating the mind.
It's a net cast by Māra for the defilement of living beings:
with endless drawbacks, much pain,
    great poison,
giving little enjoyment, creating conflict, drying up the good side [of the mind].

I, having cast off[2] much trouble like this caused by sensuality,
    will not return to it,
as I always delight in unbinding.

Doing battle with sensuality in hopes of the cool state, I will stay heedful, finding delight[3]
in the ending of fetters.
I follow the path—
    eightfold, straight,
    griefless, stainless, secure—over which great seers have crossed."

See this Subhā, the goldsmith's daughter,
standing firm in the Dhamma,
entering the imperturbable state,[4] doing jhāna at the foot of a tree.
This is the eighth day of her going forth confident, beautiful through the true Dhamma.
Trained by Uppalavaṇṇā,[5] she's a three-knowledge woman[6] who's left death behind;
freed from slavery, debtless, a nun with developed faculties,[7] set loose from all ties,
her task done,
effluent- free.

Sakka, lord of beings,
with his community of devas, approaching her through supranormal power, pays homage to her:

    Subhā the goldsmith's daughter.

Thig 14 Subhā & the Libertine

As Subhā the nun was going through Jīvaka's delightful mango grove, a libertine (a goldsmith's son) blocked her path, so she said to him:

'What wrong have I done you that you stand in my way?
It's not proper, my friend, that a man should touch
a woman gone forth.
I respect the Master's message,
the training pointed out by the One Well-Gone.
I am pure, without blemish:
    Why do you stand in my way?
You—your mind agitated, impassioned;
I—unagitated, unimpassioned, with a mind everywhere released:
    Why do you stand in my way?'

'You are young & not bad-looking,
what need do you have for going forth?
Throw off your ochre robe—
    Come, let's delight in the flowering grove.
A sweetness they exude everywhere,
the trees risen-up with their pollen.
The beginning of spring is a pleasant season—
    Come, let's delight in the flowering grove.
The trees with their blossoming tips moan, as it were, in the breeze:
What delight will you have
if you plunge into the grove alone?
Frequented by herds of wild beasts, disturbed by elephants rutting & aroused:
You want to go

unaccompanied
into the great, lonely, frightening grove?

Like a doll made of gold, you will go about,
like a goddess in the gardens of heaven.
With delicate, smooth Kāsī fabrics,
you will shine, O beauty without compare.
I would gladly do your every bidding
if we were to dwell in the glade.
For there is no creature dearer to me than you, O nymph with the languid regard.
If you do as I ask, happy, come live in my house.
Dwelling in the calm of a palace, have women wait on you,
wear delicate Kāsī fabrics, adorn yourself with garlands & creams.
I will make you many & varied ornaments of gold, jewels, & pearls.
Climb onto a costly bed, scented with sandalwood carvings, with a well-washed coverlet, beautiful, spread with a woolen quilt, brand new.

Like a blue lotus rising from the water where no human beings dwell, you will go to old age with your limbs unseen, if you stay as you are in the holy life.'

'What do you assume of any essence, here in this cemetery grower, filled with corpses, this body destined to break up?
What do you see when you look at me, you who are out of your mind?'

'Your eyes are like those of a fawn, like those of a sprite in the mountains.
Seeing your eyes, my sensual delight
grows all the more.
Like tips they are, of blue lotuses,

in your golden face
    —spotless:
Seeing your eyes, my sensual delight
    grows all the more.
Even if you should go far away,
I will think only of your pure,
    long-lashed gaze,
for there is nothing dearer to me than your eyes, O nymph with the languid regard.'

'You want to stray from the road, you want the moon as a plaything,
you want to jump over Mount Sineru, you who have designs on one born of the Buddha.
For there is nothing anywhere at all in the cosmos with its devas, that would be an object of passion for me.
    I don't even know what that passion would be,
    for it's been killed, root & all, by the path.
Like embers from a pit—scattered,
like a bowl of poison—evaporated,
    I don't even see what that passion would be,
    for it's been killed, root & all, by the path.
Try to seduce one who hasn't reflected on this,
or who has not followed the Master's teaching.
But try it with this one who knows and you suffer.
For in the midst of praise & blame,
    pleasure & pain,
my mindfulness stands firm.
Knowing the unattractiveness of things compounded,
my mind cleaves to nothing at all.
I am a follower of the One Well-Gone, riding the vehicle of the eightfold way:
My arrow removed, effluent-free,
I delight, having gone to an empty dwelling.

For I have seen well-painted puppets, hitched up with sticks & strings, made to dance in various ways.
When the sticks & strings are removed,
thrown away, scattered, shredded, smashed into pieces, not to be found,
in what will the mind there make its home?
This body of mine, which is just like that,
when devoid of dhammas doesn't function.
When, devoid of dhammas, it doesn't function,
in what will the mind there make its home?

Like a mural you've seen, painted on a wall, smeared with yellow orpiment, there your vision has been distorted, your perception[1] of a human being—pointless.
Like an evaporated mirage,
like a tree of gold in a dream, like a magic show in the midst of a crowd—you run blind after what is unreal.
Resembling a ball of sealing wax, set in a hollow,
with a bubble in the middle and bathed with tears, eye secretions are born there too:
The parts of the eye
are rolled all together in various ways.'

Plucking out her lovely eye, with mind unattached
she felt no regret.

'Here, take this eye. It's yours.'

Straightaway she gave it to him.
Straightaway his passion faded right there,
and he begged her forgiveness:

'Be well, follower of the holy life.

This sort of thing
won't happen again.
Harming a person like you is like embracing a blazing fire.
It's as if I have seized a poisonous snake.
So may you be well. Forgive me.'

And released from there, the nun went to the excellent Buddha's presence.
When she saw the mark of his excellent merit, her eye became
as it was before.

Glossary

Pali-English

Abhidhamma: (1) In the discourses of the Pali Canon, this term simply means "higher Dhamma," and a systematic attempt to define the Buddha's teachings and understand their interrelationships. (2) A later collection of treatises collating lists of categories drawn from the teachings in the discourses, added to the Canon several centuries after the Buddha's life.

Ājīvaka: An ascetic belonging to any one of a group of schools that, for various reasons, taught that morality was nothing more than a social convention and that human action was either unreal, totally predetermined, or powerless to effect results. See DN 2.

Arahant: A "worthy one" or "pure one;" a person whose mind is free of defilement and thus is not destined for further rebirth. A title for the Buddha and the highest level of his noble disciples.

Āsava: Effluent; fermentation. Four qualities—sensuality, views, becoming, and ignorance—that "flow out" of the mind and create the flood of the round of death and rebirth.

Asura: A member of a race of beings who, like the Titans in Greek mythology, battled the devas for sovereignty in heaven and lost.

Bhikkhu: A Buddhist monk.

Bodhisatta: "A being (striving) for awakening;" the term used to describe the Buddha before he actually became Buddha, from his first aspiration to Buddhahood until the time of his full awakening. Sanskrit form: Bodhisattva.

Brahman: In common usage, a brahman is a member of the priestly caste, which claimed to be the highest caste in India, based on birth. In a specifically Buddhist usage, "brahman" can also mean an arahant, conveying the point that excellence is based, not on birth or race, but on the qualities attained in the mind.

Brahmā: An inhabitant of the heavenly realms of form or formlessness.

Deva: Literally, "shining one." An inhabitant of the terrestrial or heavenly realms higher than the human.

Dhamma: (1) Event; action; (2) a phenomenon in & of itself; (3) mental quality; (4) doctrine, teaching; (5) nibbāna (although there are passages describing nibbāna as the abandoning of all dhammas). Sanskrit form: Dharma.

Gandhabba: (1) A celestial musician, the lowest level of celestial deva. (2) A being about to take birth.

Gotama: The Buddha's clan name.

Indra (Inda): King of the devas of the Heaven of the Thirty-three. Another name for Sakka.

Jhāna: Mental absorption. A state of strong concentration focused on a single sensation or mental notion. This term is derived from the verb jhāyati, which means to burn with a steady, still flame.

Māra: The personification of temptation and all forces, within and without, that create obstacles to release from saṁsāra.

Meru: A mountain at the center of the universe where devas are said to dwell.

Nāga: A magical serpent, technically classed as a common animal, but possessing many of the powers of a deva, including the ability to take on human shape. Sometimes this term is used metaphorically, in the sense of "Great One," to indicate an arahant.

Nibbāna: Literally, the "unbinding" of the mind from passion, aversion, and delusion, and from the entire round of death and rebirth. As this term also denotes the extinguishing of a fire, it carries connotations of stilling, cooling, and peace. "Total nibbāna" in some contexts denotes the experience of awakening; in others, the final passing away of an arahant. Sanskrit form: Nirvāṇa.

Nigaṇṭha: Literally, one without ties. An ascetic in the Jain religion.

Pali: The name of the Canon that forms the basis for the Theravāda and, by extension, the language in which it was composed.

Paṭicca-samuppāda: Dependent co-arising; dependent origination. A map showing the way ignorance and craving interact with the aggregates (khandha) and sense media (āyatana) to bring about stress and suffering. As the interactions are complex, there are several different versions of paṭicca samuppāda given in the suttas. In the most common one (given, for example, in SN 12:2), the map starts with ignorance. In another common one (given here in DN 15), the map starts with the interrelation between name (nāma) and form (rūpa) on the one hand, and sensory consciousness on the other.

Pāṭimokkha: Basic code of monastic discipline, composed of 227 rules for monks and 311 for nuns.

Pavāraṇā: Invitation; a monastic ceremony marking the end of the rains retreat on the full moon in October. During the ceremony, each monk invites his fellow monks to accuse him of any offenses they may have suspected him of having committed.

Rāhu: An asura who, according to legend, tried to swallow the sun. He is now a head with no body who still tries to swallow the sun and moon—thus causing solar and lunar eclipses—but his lack of a body means that such eclipses last only a short while.

Rakkhasa: A fierce spirit said to dwell in bodies of water.

Sakka: King of the devas of the Heaven of the Thirty-three. Another name for Indra.

Sakya: The Buddha's family name.

Samaṇa: Contemplative. Literally, a person who abandons the conventional obligations of social life in order to find a way of life more "in tune" (sama) with the ways of nature.

Saṁsāra: Transmigration; the process of wandering through repeated states of becoming, with their attendant death and rebirth.

Saṁvega: A sense of chastened dismay over the meaninglessness and futility of life as it is ordinarily lived, combined with a strong sense of urgency in looking for a way out.

Saṅgha: On the conventional (sammati) level, this term denotes the communities of Buddhist monks and nuns. On the ideal (ariya) level, it denotes those followers of the Buddha, lay or ordained, who have attained at least stream-entry.

Stūpa: A memorial to a dead person, derived from the form of a burial mound.

Sutta: Discourse. Sanskrit form: sūtra.

Tādin: "Such," an adjective to describe one who has attained the goal. It indicates that the person's state is indefinable but not subject to change or influences of any sort.

Tathāgata: Literally, "one who has become authentic (tatha-āgata) or is truly gone (tathā-gata)": an epithet used in ancient India for a person who has attained the highest religious goal. In Buddhism, it usually denotes the Buddha, although occasionally it also denotes any of his arahant disciples.

Uposatha: Observance day, coinciding with the full moon, new moon, and half moons. Lay Buddhists often observe the eight precepts on this day. Monks recite the Pāṭimokkha on the full moon and new moon uposathas.

Vinaya: The monastic discipline, whose rules and traditions comprise six volumes in printed text. The Buddha's own term for the religion he founded was "this Dhamma & Vinaya."

Yakkha: Spirit; a lower level of deva—sometimes friendly to human beings, sometimes not—often dwelling in trees or other wild places.

English-Pali

Although I have tried to be as consistent as possible in rendering Pali terms into English, there are a few cases where a single English term will not do justice to all the meanings of a Pali term. Although the rule of one English equivalent per one Pali word makes for consistency, any truly bilingual person will know that such a rule can create ludicrous distortions in translation. Thus, while I have generally tried to avoid using one English term to translate two different Pali terms, there are cases where I have found it necessary to render single Pali terms with two or more English terms, depending on context. Citta in some cases is rendered as mind, in others as heart, and in still others as intent. Similarly, loka is rendered either as cosmos or world, manas as intellect or heart, āyatana as medium or dimension, upādāna as clinging or sustenance, and dhamma as phenomenon, quality, or principle. If you see the word heart in a prose passage, it is translating citta; if in a passage of poetry, it is translating manas.

Also, for some of the Pali terms playing a central role in the teaching, I have chosen equivalents that do not follow general usage. In the following list I have marked these equivalents with asterisks. Explanations for these choices are provided at the end of the list.

Acquisition: Upadhi literally means "belongings," "baggage," "paraphernalia." In the suttas, it means the mental baggage that the mind carries around. The Cūḷaniddesa, a late canonical work, lists ten types of upadhi: craving, views, defilement, action, misconduct, nutriment (physical and mental), irritation, the four physical properties sustained in the body (earth, water, wind, and fire), the six external sense media, and the six forms of corresponding sensory consciousness. The state without upadhi or acquisitions is unbinding.

Aggregate: Any of the five types of phenomena that serve as objects of clinging and as bases for a sense of self: form, feeling, perception, mental fabrications, and consciousness.

Becoming: The processes of giving rise, within the mind, to states of being that allow for physical or mental birth on any of three levels: the level of sensuality, the level of form, and the level of formlessness.

Clinging/sustenance: The Pali term upādāna, which is used both on the physical and psychological levels, carries a double meaning on both levels. On the physical level, it denotes both the fuel of a fire and to the fire's act of clinging to its fuel. On the psychological level, it denotes both the sustenance for becoming that the mind clings to, and to the act of clinging to its sustenance. To capture these double meanings, I have sometimes rendered upādāna as clinging, sometimes as sustenance, and sometimes as both.

Enlightened one: Throughout these suttas I have rendered buddha as "Awakened," and dhīra as "enlightened." As Jan Gonda points out in his book, The Vision of the Vedic Poets, the word dhīra was used in Vedic and Buddhist poetry to mean a person who has the heightened powers of mental vision needed to perceive the "light" of the underlying principles of the cosmos, together with the expertise to implement those principles in the affairs of life and to reveal them to others. A person enlightened in this sense may also be awakened in the formal Buddhist sense, but is not necessarily so.

Fabrication: Saṅkhāra literally means "putting together," and carries connotations of jerry-rigged artificiality. It is applied to physical and to mental processes, as well as to the products of those processes. Various English words have been suggested as renderings for saṅkhāra, such as "formation," "determination," "force," and "constructive activity." However, "fabrication," in both of its senses, as the process of fabrication and the fabricated things that result, seems the best equivalent for capturing the connotations as well as the denotations of the term.

Harmonious and Dissonant: Throughout ancient cultures, the terminology of music was used to describe the moral quality of people and acts. Dissonant intervals or poorly-tuned musical instruments were metaphors for evil; harmonious intervals and well-tuned instruments were metaphors for good. In Pali, the term sama—"even"—describes an instrument tuned on-pitch; visama means off-pitch. AN 6:55 contains a famous passage where the Buddha reminds Soṇa Koḷivisa—who had been over-exerting himself in the practice—that a lute sounds appealing only if the strings are neither too taut nor too lax, but "evenly" tuned. This same terminology came to be applied to human actions, with the connotation that good actions were not only appealing, but also in tune with the true nature of the laws of action.

Inconstant: The usual rendering for anicca is "impermanent." However, the antonym of the term, nicca, carries connotations of constancy and reliability; and as anicca is used to emphasize the point that conditioned phenomena are unreliable as a basis for true happiness, this seems a useful rendering for conveying this point.

Objectification: The term papañca has entered popular usage in Buddhist circles to indicate obsessive, runaway thoughts that harass the mind. But in the suttas, the term is used to indicate, not the amount of thinking that harasses the mind, but the categories used in a particular type of thinking that harasses the mind and extends outward to create conflict with others.

Sn 4:14 states that the root of the categories of papañca is the perception, "I am the thinker." From this self-objectifying thought, in which one takes on the identity of a being, a number of categories can be derived: being/not-being, me/not-me, mine/not-mine, doer/done-to, feeder/food. This last pair of categories comes from the fact that, as a being, one has to lay claim to food, both physical and mental, to maintain that being (Khp 4). Thinking in terms of these categories inevitably leads to conflict, as different beings fight over their food. Because this harassment and conflict come from a self-objectifying thought that leads to the objectification of others as well, objectification seems to be the best English equivalent for papañca.

Obsession: Anusaya is usually translated as "underlying tendency" or "latent tendency." These translations are based on the etymology of the term, which literally means, "to lie down with." However, in actual usage, the related verb (anuseti) means to be obsessed with something, for one's thoughts to return and "lie down with it" (or, in our idiom, to "dwell on it") over and over again.

Stress: The Pali term dukkha, which is traditionally translated in the commentaries as, "that which is hard to bear," is notorious for having no truly adequate equivalent in English, but stress—in its basic sense as a strain on body or mind—seems as close as English can get. In the Canon, dukkha applies both to physical and to mental phenomena, ranging from the intense stress of acute anguish or pain to the innate burdensomeness of even the most subtle mental or physical fabrications.

Unbinding: Because nibbāna is used to denote not only the Buddhist goal, but also the extinguishing of a fire, it is usually rendered as "extinguishing" or, even worse, "extinction." However, a close look at ancient Indian views of the workings of fire (see The Mind Like Fire Unbound) shows that people of the Buddha's time felt that a fire, in going out, did not go out of existence but was simply freed from its agitation and attachment to its fuel. Thus, when applied to the Buddhist goal, the primary connotation of nibbāna is one of release and liberation. According to the commentaries, the literal meaning of the word nibbāna is "unbinding," and as this is a rare case where the literal and contextual meanings of a term coincide, this seems to be the ideal English equivalent.
